its provisions. Two years ago his hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Henry Seymour) called attention to the subject of the Ecclesiastical Statutes, by a Motion of a very wide and extensive character, which proposed that the whole of them should be consolidated. The Government was not prepared to embark in so large a scheme; but they promised to see whether a certain portion of the Acts bearing on the subject, namely, those commonly known as the Church Building Acts, could not be consolidated. One of the most eminent ecclesiastical lawyers of the day, under instructions from the Lord Chancellor, prepared the draft of a Bill for the purpose of effecting that object; and it became his own duty to revise and finally settle the form of a Bill from the draft so prepared by Dr. Stephens, and having done so he introduced it to the House. In performing that duty he laid down for his own guidance the principle of avoiding, as far as he could do so, the introduction of any material changes into the law on subjects of importance on which there were divided opinions in that House and out of doors. His wish was to avoid every innovation whatever in the substance of the laws of the Church; and the difficulties which he had to experience in effecting that object were more formidable than at first sight they might seem to be. The case was one in which the mere collection and re-enactment of all the various provisions of the existing law, without any amendment or alteration of those provisions, was impossible; and, accordingly, both the draft Bill originally prepared by Dr. Stephens, and the Bill introduced by himself, contained various Amendments, principally for the purpose of simplifying and reducing into harmony the confusion and inconsistency which was found to exist in some of the details of the Acts which it was desired to consolidate. Some of these Acts contained provisions expressly relating to the subject of church rates; and these provisions Dr. Stephens, in the proper discharge of the duty intrusted to him, embodied in his draft. The Government, however, felt, that the passing of the measure might be endangered, if these provisions continued to form part of it; and, on the other hand, it was not prepared to repeal them. It was, therefore, determined, neither to consolidate nor to repeal those parts of the former Acts, which related to the levying of church rates for particular purposes; but to allow them to remain in force as originally enacted. On the second reading of the Bill some reference was made to a question which had then lately arisen before the Courts of Law, as to church rates in new parishes; and he then stated that it was quite impossible for the Government to propose in such a Bill any interference with that subject. The object of the Bill was to simplify and consolidate the Church Building Acts; but the Government were not anxious to, in any way, embark in the settlement of the church rate question by means of that measure. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee, and he must say that that Committee, in which various opinions were represented, took a great deal of pains with the Bill, and the members of the Committee adopted the same view as that held by the Government—namely, that no attempt should be made by that Bill to introduce any extension of the principle of church rates, or any provision for the abolition of those rates. The hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Remington Mills) moved to introduce in a particular clause words which would have had the effect of providing that church rates should not be levied in new parishes; but all the other members of the Committee, including two hon. Friends of his own, who always voted for the abolition of church rates, voted against the Motion of the hon. Member for Wycombe, on the ground that it was not a part of the object of the Bill to use it as an opportunity of introducing any important alteration of the law with respect to church rates. The Bill passed through Committee, and the Committee went farther than he had ventured to do when introducing the Bill to the House; for they recommended that clauses should be introduced consolidating, and therefore re-enacting, those provisions of the former Acts, expressly relating to church rates, which had been left unrepealed but had not been consolidated. They thought the Bill would not be perfect unless it included all enactments, which it was not proposed to alter. While wishing to pay every deference to the decision of the Committee, he had, nevertheless, felt bound to deal with the Bill in an independent way, when the question arose of introducing it again. He still thought that the recommendation of the Committee would lead to a contest of opinions on the subject of church rates, when the additional clauses came to be considered; and, therefore, he thought it would be more advisable to adhere to the original decision of the Government, and neither consolidate nor repeal the church rate clauses by means of such a Bill. He, therefore, prepared a Bill on that footing, which was in other respects, in substance, as it passed the Select Committee. After it was introduced, a great deal of discussion took place out of doors, and one particular clause was regarded by a large body out of doors and by some hon. Members in that House as having the very effect which the Government desired to avoid in bringing forward the measure—namely, as altering the status quo upon the subject of church rates. Under these circumstances, it became a matter for the serious consideration of the Government how far that objection, whether well or ill-founded, might prove a practical obstacle to the passing of the measure, and also how far it might be met by a modification of the Bill. It had been seriously represented, notwithstanding the engagements which had been given that there should be as far as possible an evenhanded balance held between both parties on the subject, yet that an attempt was made in the Bill to extend the law of church rates to cases in which it was not applicable under the present law. He trusted that there were not many hon. Members who believed him to be personally capable of such an attempt. To say, indeed, that a Government, the greater part of whose Members were in the habit of voting for the abolition of church rates, would be parties to such a scheme would be too unreasonable for any one to believe. Because, however, he was known to be individually in favour of some provision being made for the maintenance of the fabrics of the Established Church, it was inferred by some that he might be capable of abusing the opportunities he enjoyed, and of endeavouring to do indirectly that which he had said he should endeavour to avoid. This rendered it necessary, that he should explain to the House, in a little detail, how the case as to church rates in new parishes really stood under the existing law, and show that there was nothing in the present Bill which could possibly have the effect of making such parishes liable to church rates, unless they were already so liable. There were twelve principal Acts relating to the creation of new parishes, and two principal classes of new parishes to which those Acts referred. The first class were new parishes under the Acts anterior to those of Sir Robert Peel and Lord Blandford, of 1843 and 1856, and the other class were new parishes under the Peel and Blandford Acts of 1843 and 1856. The first class consisted of new parishes which by the express enactments of the Acts under which they were founded were authorized to raise church rates within themselves for the purpose of repairing their own churches, but were also saddled with contributions to the mother church for twenty years. Some persons had fallen into the error of supposing that Parliament had decided against the principle of allowing church rates to be levied for these new parishes. The original Acts which enabled district parishes to be created were the Million Acts of 1818-19, and by the express terms of the 70th section of the first Act it was enacted that—

“The repairs of all such district churches or chapels shall be made by the districts to which they respectively belong, by rates to be raised within the district in like manner as in case of repairs of churches by parishes, and every such district shall be deemed in law a separate and distinct parish for that purpose.”

Section 71 of that Act superadded, by way of proviso, a continued liability to be rated also to the repair of the original parish church for twenty years from the consecration of the district church or chapel. Since that time no less than seven later Acts, passed in 1822, 1824, 1831, 1838, 1845, 1848, and 1851, referred to these provisions of the Million Acts for the creation of “separate and distinct parishes,” and “district parishes,” with all the incidents and consequences attached to them by the Million Acts, as in full force and effect, and contained a variety of further enactments facilitating and extending their application to cases to which they did not originally apply. There were also powers in the Million Acts and some of the later Acts for building, rebuilding, and enlarging churches by means of church rates. The Government might, with far more justice than there was in the charge now made against them, have been exposed to the imputation of legislating, by this Bill, too much in favour of the views of those who were opposed to church rates in new parishes; because, by the process of consolidation and simplification adopted in this Bill they had swept away entirely the whole of the machinery by which those “district parishes,” and “distinct and separate parishes,” to which the power of levying church rates for the support of their churches was expressly attached, could be called into existence under the provisions of the Million Acts and the rest of that series of statutes; and if the Bill should pass as it left the Committee, there could no longer be any new parishes that would have expressly conferred upon them the power of raising church rates. The Government and the Select Committee had adopted in that consolidation the simplest form of new parishes—namely, the form of the Peel and Blandford Acts, and they had proposed to abolish for the future the earlier forms under which the power of raising church rates was expressly conferred. That was not done in order to affect the subject of church rates, but because it was thought better, for other reasons, to get rid of the older machinery; and they did not consider, in so doing, whether they would or would not diminish the area within which the law of church rates might be applied. The Peel and Blandford Acts of 1843 and 1856 had introduced a new description of parishes; and as some differences of form existed, involving more important considerations, it was thought desirable to reduce all to one single model, and to adopt, for this purpose, the latest form—namely, that of Lord Blandford's Act. Sir Robert Peel in 1843, when he proposed that Queen Anne's bounty should advance £600,000 for the creation of new districts, introduced a Bill for the creation of those new districts. He proposed to endow districts which had not churches at the time of endowing them, hoping that private benefactors would provide churches, and his Bill proposed that as soon as a church was consecrated for any district, it should become a new parish for ecclesiastical purposes. There was not one word in that Act, one way or the other, about church rates, and from that circumstance it had been inferred that these new parishes would not have the same incidents as to church rates which the older class of new parishes possessed. It had also been asserted that Sir Robert Peel made some declaration of his own intentions on that subject; but he was bound to say that he had not been able to discover that Sir Robert Peel had left on record any such declaration of his intentions. In 1828 Sir Robert Peel was said to have declared that it was not expedient to apply the law of church rates to any new parishes; but nothing could be a greater mistake than that representation. In the first place, the facts already stated showed, that, long after 1828, Sir Robert Peel's Government and other Governments which followed were parties to an extension of the system of the new parishes, created under the Million Acts, to which church rates were expressly annexed. Sir Robert Peel's declaration in 1828 was, that he did not propose to devolve upon the Church Building Society the power of imposing church rates upon any parish. That was quite true. But he said that, on bringing in a Bill to incorporate that society and empower them not to make new parishes, but simply to receive voluntary contributions for the building and repairing of churches and chapels. There was at that time no legislation at all proposed on the subject of new parishes. Whatever might have been Sir Robert Peel's opinion in 1843, he did not at any time leave it on record; but he (the Attorney General) entirely agreed that the general impression and belief was that the effect of his legislation in 1843 differed from that of the earlier Acts, and that it would not allow church rates to be levied in what were called the Peel parishes. The next stage of legislation upon this subject was the introduction of Lord Blandford's Bill. That was first introduced in 1855, and the measure founded upon it became law in the following year. As to that also there was some misapprehension. In the first place that Bill was in no sense a Government Bill, as was stated at the time by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department; it was not introduced with the sanction of the Government, though they approved its objects. Lord Blandford desired to extend, as far as might be, to all districts the principle of the new parishes under Sir Robert Peel's Act, and more particularly to permit the creation of parishes of that description in districts where there were churches already. When the Bill was introduced it contained a clause expressly dealing with church rates. It was to this effect—

"No church rate levied within any parish shall be applicable to any but the church and to the church purposes of such parish."

In his speech upon the introduction of the Bill, Lord Blandford said—

"The districts (i. e. district parishes) were liable for twenty years to the rates of the mother church, and, as no benefit was derived, the district churchmen frequently refused the rates more from this reason than from any disapproval of the church as a great national institution. . . . The simple remedy, which he had endeavoured to embody in this Bill with respect to this question, was to declare that no church rate should be levied in a district which was not applied to the church of that district. . . . No church rates were to be collected in any new parish, except for the support of its own church."

When, therefore, that Bill was introduced, its author intended to enable church rates to be raised for the new parishes which he proposed to create. But the Bill was referred to a Select Committee, and came out very much altered, and amongst other changes that clause had disappeared. When it was afterwards considered in Committee in this House very little discussion took place. Sir W. Clay asked whether the second clause, in constituting separate parishes, would confer upon those parishes the right of levying church rates. Lord Blandford said positively that that would not be the effect of the clause—that the parishes thereby constituted would to all intents and purposes resemble those formed by Sir Robert Peel's Act, under which, as was known, no church rate could be levied. That statement of Lord Blandford might or might not have been correctly understood at the time, but hon. Gentlemen would do well to read the second clause upon which the question was asked, and the answer given. That clause merely provided for the creation of additional parishes in districts which had already a church, Sir Robert Peel's Act having provided for a similar object in districts without churches. The Peel parishes were expressly the subject of that clause, and no doubt Lord Blandford expressed his apprehension that these parishes would not be able, under that clause, to levy church rates. But the material clause in the Act, and one which might have the most important bearing upon the question, was not the 2nd, but was the 15th, which did not stand now as it did when this conversation took place. At that time the 15th clause wanted seven or eight lines with which it now concluded. It provided that the resident inhabitants of every new parish, whether constituted under the Peel or Blandford Acts,

"Shall for all ecclesiastical purposes be parishioners thereof and of no other parish, and such new parish shall for the like purposes have and possess all the same rights and privileges, and be affected with such and the same liabilities as are incident or belong to a distinct and separate parish."

There the clause stopped originally, and in that state it passed, not only through the Select Committee, but also through the Committee of this House. It was not till the Report, that, on the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir William Ilcatheote), these important words were added—

“And to no other liabilities: provided always that nothing herein contained shall be taken to affect the legal liabilities of any parish regulated by a local Act of Parliament, or the security for any loan of money legally borrowed under any Act of Parliament or otherwise.”

The saving of securities for monies borrowed under an Act of Parliament could scarcely have reference to anything but monies borrowed on the security of rates; and these words were very likely added for the express purpose of producing, or making more clear, the effect which some supposed now to be produced by the clause. That was the form in which Lord Blandford's Act passed; and this was the state in which Her Majesty's present Government found the matter, with the addition that in the autumn of 1862 the question as to the effect of the Peel and Blandford Acts was raised in a suit about a church rate at Shrewsbury—the case of “Gough v. Jones”—in which Dr. Lushington held, not that Church rates might be raised for the repair of the church of a new parish, but that the inhabitants of a new parish were not liable to the church rate levied for the Church of the mother parish. It had occurred to many persons since, and he believed the opinion had been acted upon, that the converse proposition ought also to hold, and that if the new parish were exonerated from the church rate levied in the old parish, it would be entitled, on the same principle, to raise a church rate for its own purposes. Dr. Lushington in his judgment did not proceed upon the interpretation of Lord Blandford's Act at all. He took an earlier clause, the 14th, which said that whenever certain offices of the church should be performed in the church of a new parish or district, and the fees should belong to the incumbent, then it was to be a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes, such as was contemplated in the 15th section of Sir Robert Peel's Act. Dr. Lushington said, “That refers us to Sir Robert Peel's Act, so let us see whether church rates could be levied under that Statute.” Then he fastened upon the term “ecclesiastical purposes” in the 15th section of Sir Robert Peel's Act. That, in his opinion, must mean all ecclesiastical purposes; and he held that church rates were ecclesiastical purposes. In this way, construing Sir Robert Peel's Act, and not the 15th section of Lord Blandford's Act,

Dr. Lushington arrived at the conclusion that church rates were not to be levied in the new parish for the purposes of the old parish. He believed it was proposed to appeal from this judgment to the Privy Council, and it was therefore impossible yet to assume that this was actually the law. At the same time it must be obvious to every one that there were elements for further consideration arising out of the 15th section of Lord Blandford's Act, which were not exhausted by Dr. Lushington's decision in that case. He would now explain the course which had been taken in the preparation of the present Bill, under these circumstances. If they consolidated the provisions of Lord Blandford's Act at all, it was impossible to leave out the 15th section, which was the very keystone of the arch; and what was done, therefore, was simply to take the language of that section and reproduce it, church rates not being mentioned, leaving it to have in the new Act just the operation which it would have in the old Act. Nothing was done to authorize the levy of church rates under it, if they could not have been levied in like circumstances under the old Act. Whatever that operation of Lord Blandford's Act was, it was, at present, the law of the land; and to alter it, so as to declare that church rates should not be levied for the purposes of these new parishes (if they might be so levied under the existing law), would have been a plain and direct departure from the engagement given by the Government, that they would not attempt, by the present measure, to alter the law of church rates. If a majority of this or of the other House of Parliament thought the law on this subject ought to be as it was, it could hardly be expected that they would recognize the obligation, sought by some to be cast upon them, to alter that law, merely because its effect might have been misapprehended by this or that individual, either when Lord Blandford's Act was passing through the House of Commons, or at any other time. Those who thought that the law ought to be altered, had the right and the power to bring that question to a direct issue, by moving for leave to introduce a Bill for that purpose; but he did not think they could justly call upon the Government to take that responsibility upon themselves, much less to stake the success of a measure like the present upon any such proposal. At the same time, the Government were most desirous of doing all that they properly could to remove any reasonable ground of exception, if such could be shown to exist, to the language or the possible effect of any part of the present Bill. It had occurred to him that the objection with regard to the disputed clause, which had been adopted out of Lord Blandford's Act, might be met by omitting the whole of those clauses which related to the Peel and Blandford parishes, leaving Sir Robert Peel's and Lord Blandford's Acts unrepealed; and that he should have been perfectly prepared to do, if, all things considered, it had appeared the more advisable course to proceed with the Bill during the present Session. But there seemed to be good reasons for withdrawing the Bill just now. On the one hand, the Government had been informed that nothing would be satisfactory to certain gentlemen except a substantive alteration in the law, which of course would be inconsistent with the engagements which had been given when the subject was undertaken. He was also bound to say the moment a cry was raised, on one side, it seemed as if the defence of the Bill, on the other side, might, perhaps, be rested by some on grounds equally remote from that impartiality on the matter in dispute, which the Government desired to preserve; and that any such modification of it, as he had just indicated, would be unacceptable to a powerful class of its supporters. But there was also another subject which had exposed the Bill to objections, sometimes urged in strong terms, from a very different class of opponents, and upon which some explanation was due. The Government had been accused of new legislation, not only on the question of church rates, but also in the very opposite direction, on the question of pew rents. Some zealous churchmen had been as severe on the Bill for that reason as gentlemen who held an opposite opinion had been on account of church rates. He wished to state simply that every one of the Acts under which new parishes were created authorized, without a single exception, the levying of pew rents in the churches of those parishes. The Government, therefore, only took up the system which was found to prevail under the sanction of every former Act. The proportion varied, but the principle existed. His own personal sympathies were with those who did not like pew rents, but were in favour of free churches. But there might often be more harm done by standing up for an abstract principle to an impracticable extent than by adopting the course which, under the circumstances, was practically the best. Finding, therefore, the principle of pew rents pervading the whole of these Acts, it appeared necessary to adhere to it, but yet it was desirable, while consolidating the Acts, not to extend the principle. And in conformity with that object a clause was introduced into the Bill, by which it was provided, that in no church should the number of free seats be diminished by the operation of the Bill. The Select Committee had thought fit with regard to the Blandford churches to alter the minimum fixed by the Act from half to one-third. He was not present when that alteration was made; it was unnecessary to say how he should have voted if he had been, but he felt bound to introduce the Bill as it came from the Committee in that respect. It was, however, the greatest mistake possible to suppose that the Bill was intended to legislate in favour of the principle of pew rents, or to give that principle a more extended application, any more than that it was intended to legislate in favour of church rates, or to give them a more extended application. The Bill was honestly intended for the purpose of doing some practical good without meddling with controverted matters. He was sorry, that, for the present, the attempt had failed. It was not a Bill of a pretentious or ambitious character; but he was quite sure that the House would give him credit for having attempted to promote a useful object in all good faith, and having no idea in view except to do that which under the circumstances appeared most just and reasonable. He begged to move that the order be discharged.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the said Order be discharged."
 (Mr. Attorney General.)

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS said, that the principle which those who agreed with him contended for had been admitted by the hon. and learned Gentleman, that, during the last thirty years, no Bill had been carried through the House which did not proceed on the assumption that church rates were not to be interfered with. He wished to call attention to what passed in the year 1828, when an attempt was made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day to pass a Bill which was not allowed to be read a second time, although he stated that it would not interfere with the question of church rates.

MR. HUNT said, he had listened with great admiration to the able and luminous speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, but had heard with great regret the announcement that the Bill was to be withdrawn. He had been a Member of the Select Committee which had discussed the Bill, and he felt in listening to the explanations of the Attorney General that a more powerful speech in favour of a second reading he had not often heard, and he learned with sorrow that the unanswerable arguments in favour of the Bill were to be followed by its withdrawal. The Select Committee who sat upon that question was composed of Gentlemen whose opinions ought to command respect: the Committee gave a most attentive consideration to the subject, and most of them were most anxious to carry out the arrangement that the question of church rates was not to be altered by this Consolidation Bill. Having been himself always a warm supporter of church rates in that House, he had strictly adhered to the engagement. But what was the course taken by one hon. Member, who was against the maintenance of church rates? Having found that the law of church rates with regard to the new parishes, as laid down by Dr. Lushington, was different from what he supposed, he thought that he had got an opportunity for altering the law, and he proposed to make it, by means of the Consolidation Bill, that which he thought it was. But, to the honour of the other Members of the Committee who were opposed to church rates, they took a contrary view, and they proceeded in the consideration of the Bill in strict accordance with the engagements which had been entered into. The Bill came down from the Committee at too late a period to be proceeded with, but his hon. and learned Friend had introduced the present measure very nearly in the shape in which it left the Committee, and at a period of the Session favourable to its discussion. With regard to the course that had been taken to-night, he deeply compassionated him on the pressure that had been put upon him. If he had been left to his own will he would have carried the measure and earned the gratitude of all Churchmen for having effected that which had been a much desired object for many years past. The condition and entanglement of the law had been a matter of disgrace to the Legislature for many years, and if his hon. and learned Friend had been able to use his great powers and influential position in removing that stigma, and had made the law clear and intelligible, he would have earned the gratitude of all Churchmen in this country, and it would have conferred additional honour upon him. He regretted that his hon. and learned Friend had taken service with Ministers whose political exigencies were such as obliged them to violate their own convictions and bow to the unreasoning clamour of a small section of their supporters. There was not a single reason for the withdrawal of the Bill, but it had been done simply to obviate the disaffection and estrangement of a small section. What was the single point upon which some of the anti-Church party dissented from that Bill? The decision in the case of "Gough v. Jones" decided that new parishes under Lord Blandford's Act were not liable to pay church rates to the mother church, and the Committee before whom the Bill was sent well considered it, and, finding they had no power to alter the law, they took it as it had been laid down by Dr. Lushington, and made no change in it; but the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. M. T. Smith), and those who supported him, took another view of the matter, but that was no reason for withdrawing the Bill. It was a Consolidation Bill, and ought to have been proceeded with; and if the hon. Member for Wycombe, and those who took a similar view of it, thought it a convenient opportunity for taking the sense of the House upon their view of it, they ought to have given notice of an Amendment in Committee on this Bill, and then the question would have been decided. The Government had taken a weak and unworthy course in the matter, and they had no right to withdraw the Bill from the consideration of the House simply from fear of a division in their own party. Having sat on the Committee last year for many weeks, and having bestowed his best attention on the subject, he confessed that he felt great regret at the result of the Bill.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he two years ago moved the introduction of a Bill for the consolidation of the ecclesiastical law, and in which he was supported by many influential Members of the Government, but from some cause or other he was defeated, and he was unable to carry the whole of the measure. The present law was in a most confused and contradictory state, and its imperfect condition had been alluded to by some of the ablest Judges of the land. Dr. Lushington and

Dr. Jelf had tried their hands at it, and the late Sir James Graham pronounced his opinion that its consolidation was impossible, but nevertheless attempts had been made to do so, and he had been informed it was referred to Dr. Stephens. He believed it had been accomplished in an able manner by Dr. Stephens, and any amendments which he had proposed were printed in italics, that the House and the Government might be able to judge of their value. But the learned Attorney General's Bill was a totally different measure, and the mistake the hon. and learned Gentleman had committed was in his attempt not to consolidate, but to amend the law, and make it an entirely new measure, and that, he believed, was the cause of its failure. He believed it was possible to carry a consolidated Bill. Directly the Bill was laid upon the table of the House, he maintained that it was an Amendment Bill establishing an entirely new code. He did not regard the failure of the present measure as any proof of the correctness of the remark of Sir James Graham, because he maintained that a Consolidation Act had not been attempted by his hon. and learned Friend. When the intricate measure, with its hundred clauses, was referred to the Committee, the Gentlemen on the Committee were engaged for four months in performing the duties which should have been undertaken by a draftsman in the solitude of his chamber. His hon. and learned Friend had said that the Bill introduced no changes in the existing law with regard to church rates. Without desiring to impugn the motives of his hon. and learned Friend, or to attribute to him the intention of surreptitiously introducing church rates where they had not hitherto been levied, the measure had no doubt given rise to disagreeable rumours as to the insertion of two or three words in the Bill which it was said would have the effect of introducing church rates into 500 or 600 parishes at some future date where their existence had hitherto been unknown. He could not understand how the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) could maintain that the Bill was a consolidative measure when he and every member of the Committee were aware of the numerous amendments and new clauses which had been introduced into it. In that Bill words were inserted which would introduce church rates into many parishes in which otherwise they would not have been known for thirty years to come. Under Sir Robert Peel's Act, and under the Marquess of Blandford's Act, church rates were not introduced, and, therefore, no opposition had been offered to those measures. But would the Conservative party—the successors of those who passed those measures upon that understanding—would they now, because of an accidental interpretation of particular words in a sense that was not intended by the framers of those measures, refuse to listen to a fair appeal of those who objected to the interpretation? The Bill had failed from the manner in which it had been brought in, and he regretted its failure, because he admired the great abilities of the Attorney General; but he should like to know what was to be the future mode of dealing with the subject. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would, instead of attempting an Amendment Bill, introduce next Session a Consolidation Bill, and if he did so there would be little doubt of his being able to carry it.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he could not agree with the last speaker in the conclusions he had drawn from Sir Robert Peel's and the Marquess of Blandford's Acts, that hon. Members on that side of the House should agree with the hon. Member for Wycombe that church rates should never be levied in the parishes thus created. Sir Robert Peel, as was well known, was a cautious man, and he did not say anything about church rates, because his measure contained no direct allusion to them; but it was not fair to argue from that silence twenty years afterwards that church rates never were to be raised in these parishes. With respect to the Marquess of Blandford's Act, the hon. and learned Attorney General had put the matter in the clearest light. It was upon a discussion upon the second clause that Lord Blandford spoke, and afterwards the Bill was altered. The measure must be judged by its words, and not by a conversation upon a particular clause. Taking the Act as they found it, and wishing to consolidate it with other Church Building Acts, it would be absurd to suppose that having successfully maintained the existence of church rates, Members on the Opposition side would agree to insert words in a Consolidation Bill, to prevent for all time the rating of church rates in the new and largely increasing parishes. The history which the hon. Gentleman had given of this Bill showed that if this Bill had been carried out merely as a measure of consolidation the present difficulty would not have arisen. The Attorney General told them that instructions were given to prepare a Consolidation Bill, and Dr. Stephens did prepare such a Bill, but political reasons prevented him from accepting the measure. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: That is not so.] The hon. and learned Gentleman had, in order to avoid controversy, left out certain sections from the Bill, but he had not gained his object. The hon. Gentlemen behind him were not conciliated by those sections being put in the schedules. Now the Committee were unanimous in recommending that, with a view to consolidation, the sections should be inserted in the body of the Bill. Again, the hon. and learned Attorney General thought it unwise to accede to the recommendations of the Committee. The sections were not introduced into the body of the Bill in order to conciliate hon. Members who sat on the benches behind the hon. and learned Gentleman. Those Gentlemen were not conciliated. The moral he should draw from those failures was, that it was an impossibility to conciliate political dissentients in any matter connected with the church. The hon. and learned Gentleman was prepared to make further sacrifices, and to strike out all reference to Sir Robert Peel's and Lord Blandford's Acts. That would not have been consolidation. It would have been a poor and miserable attempt at consolidation. If the hon. and learned Gentleman were really anxious to perform the great work of consolidation he must proceed on a clearer basis, and defy the efforts of the Liberation Society. He admitted that the hon. and learned Gentleman was not to blame in this matter. He had acted, no doubt, in the purest and highest spirit, but he had been overruled by higher powers, and had had to sacrifice his churchmanship to his connection with those who sat behind him. The hon. and learned Gentleman had certainly had to encounter very great difficulties; and as to the legal difficulties of the question there were added difficulties of a political and semi-religious nature, it could not be denied that great praise was due to him for the efforts he had made to surmount them. While regretting that the efforts had failed, he did not believe that the labours of Dr. Stephens and his coadjutors would be thrown away; but, on the contrary, he thought that it would be reserved for happier times and a more united Government to carry out the great work of consolidating the laws relating to church building.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, he agreed with all that had been said in praise of the hon. and learned Attorney General for the attention he had given to the subject. There was another Gentleman on the opposite bench to whom a tribute of praise was also due, he meant the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies. He was quite satisfied that they would not have arrived at the conclusion which they had reached but for his efforts. It had been stated that the effect of the present Bill would be to authorize the levying of pew rents in parish churches; but there was nothing in the Bill to authorize that, though it was true that such a provision might apply to certain new churches. The hon. and learned Attorney General had fallen into an error. The draft of the Bill, as originally drawn, enacted that one-fifth part of the pews in every church referred to should be free; but the Committee decided that one-third should be free, and therefore the hon. and learned Gentleman could hardly claim for having desired that one-half should be free, when in his own Bill one-fifth was inserted. The practice was to have one-third of the seats free. In the case of those new churches the law only required the consent of the Bishop, but the present Bill required that there should be the consents of the incumbent and the patron also, unless it could be shown that pew rents were absolutely necessary. In the Committee it was also proposed that pews should be let for only one year, and the great evil had arisen in consequence of letting for longer periods. There was another provision that appeared to be an act of injustice on the part of the Committee; it was enacted that during the lifetime of any incumbent, and contrary to his wish, a certain sum of money derived from pew rents should be taken away in the event of the augmentation of his income. He must say that he felt great regret that the Bill had been withdrawn, for he believed that in the hands of the Attorney General it might have been made a useful measure by getting rid of doubts and embarrassments which now existed. He, however, felt little encouragement from what had passed; and he believed that a purely Consolidation Bill could not pass, and if it did, it would only have the effect of bringing to light a number of ambiguities and obscurities in the law.

MR. REMINGTON MILLS said, that having been taunted with forcing on the Committee the consideration of the question of church rates, he wished to state that last year, on the second reading of the Bill, he objected to it on the same grounds as he did now. The Secretary of State then said that no doubt it was understood that church rates should not be leviable for the support of those district churches, that the question was one for the Select Committee, and that no instruction would be necessary. Therefore, he was fully justified by what fell from the right hon. Baronet in bringing the subject before the Committee. He altogether disclaimed having imputed to the hon. and learned Attorney General any motives except the most honourable. He believed that the hon. and learned Gentleman never attempted anything which he did not think right, and that his course was guided by the principles of justice; but from first to last, since the money from the Million Act was expended, it was understood that churches built by subscription were not to be supported by church rates. Nevertheless, he maintained that the present Bill gave the power of levying church rates in district parishes. It ought to be considered that by re-enacting a clause they gave it additional force. He stood alone in the Committee, and he had endeavoured to maintain his principles honestly, which he would always continue to do.

GREEK LOAN—(CONSOLIDATED FUND).

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in the absence of the Under Secretary for the Colonies, begged to move the following Resolution:—

"That Her Majesty be authorized to relinquish in favour of King George the First, the King of the Hellenes, during his reign, the sum of £4,000 sterling a year, and to that extent to release the Greek Treasury from the obligation of a certain arrangement, concluded at Athens in the month of June, 1860, in reference to the Greek Loan."

As the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was going to raise a constitutional question with regard to that proposal, it would be right that a convenient opportunity should be afforded for its discussion. The Government did not propose to trouble the House with any statement at that hour. He would content himself with simply moving the Resolution on which a Bill would be founded.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the merits of the Bill could best be canvassed on the second reading. He would take a discussion on the Motion of which he had given notice, on going into Committee of Supply on Monday.

COMMITTEE

(In the Committee.)

MR. WHALLEY said, he objected to the powers conferred by the Bill, and thought that the President of the Board of Trade should have a discretion in the matter. He would ask why should existing railways be allowed, without any locus standi, to interfere with any new projects? He begged to move that the 9th clause be struck out.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he rose to move that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Viscount Galway.)

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that that clause was framed with the view of removing any opposition to the Bill. When a certificate for making a branch line of railway was granted by the Board of Trade, it was thought only fair that a Railway Company which petitioned the House, and declared that it had an interest in the Bill, should have the right to be heard before the Select Committee upon the measure in question. He certainly could not consent to make any change in that arrangement.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, his objection was that landowners were not placed in as good a position in that respect as railway Companies. He would, therefore, insist upon his Amendment that the Chairman should report Progress.

STREET MUSIC (METROPOLIS) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed; "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Bass.)

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he thought the measure required grave consideration before it was sanctioned by the House, interfering as it did with a large class of persons, and those the poorest of the community. Street music might annoy some persons, but it certainly amused many more, and it was to be regretted that the extreme sensibilities of a few individuals should have led them to enter upon a crusade against it. If a Bill like that had been proposed for the City of Dublin or Glasgow, it would not have been entertained for a moment. It was said that street musicians were supported by a kind of black mail; that, in fact, they were paid by people for the purpose of getting rid of them; but he utterly denied that statement. They were supported on the ordinary principle of supply and demand. Why should they seek to interfere with the amusements of the lower orders? They might as well attempt to put down smoking, which gave enjoyment to those who indulged in it, but annoyed others who did not. They ought to have a clear proof of the evils resulting from the practice against which the Bill was aimed, and also clear proof that that was the proper mode of remedying those evils; and at present the House possessed neither. That was, after all, a paltry kind of legislation, unworthy of the British Parliament, and if they were to legislate against every petty annoyance which some individuals suffered, they would involve themselves in interminable difficulties. Many people complained of the nuisance caused by children practising at the pianoforte next door to them. He was thankful he had not to endure such an infliction. Was that to be put down by Act of Parliament also? It was a great annoyance to a house in which there was somebody lying sick that their neighbours should give an evening party. Why should that not be checked by legislation as well as organ playing? If that Bill passed it would enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to suppress the band which played in the park in the rear of his house, and which afforded so much amusement to numbers. The bands played in the parks to the great amusement of a large concourse of persons; but that Bill would enable any one of the neighbouring housekeepers to deprive the public of that source of enjoyment. He regretted that the bands of the regiments quartered in London, which were only employed by the rich at their entertainments, did not play much oftener for the gratification of the people generally. He remembered that in one of his Budget speeches, the Chancellor of the Exchequer cited it as a sign of the extraordinary poverty of large districts of the metropolis that there were whole streets in them in which the notes of the organ boy were never heard. The right hon. Gentleman meant by that, that the inhabitants were so poor that they were deprived of an innocent gratification. If street music was to be considered a nuisance, and required any kind of regulation, such regulation ought to be effected by means of the police, and not by special Act of Parliament like that now proposed. He would conclude by moving that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months.

MR. BUTT begged to second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Hankey.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. LAWSON said, he understood that the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass), who had brought forward the Bill, had a coadjutor out-of-doors who had written a pamphlet on the subject of street music, and who maintained that the whole body of organ-grinders was supported by the licensed victuallers and the proprietors of public-houses. He believed that the habit of frequenting public-houses and the amount of intoxication was much augmented by means of music at the doors. It therefore found support in the licensed victuallers.

MR. AYRTON said, there was already legislation upon this subject. He begged to suggest that the Amendment should be withdrawn on the understanding that the Bill should be brought on another night at an earlier hour, when it could be properly discussed, which it could not be at that time of the night.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he agreed with that suggestion. He had told the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) that he would not oppose the second reading, but that it would be necessary to amend the Bill in Committee.

MR. BUTT said, he thought it was absurd to suggest that the discussion should be taken in Committee. The Bill consisted of only one clause, and consequently the whole question was now at issue. [Cries of "Oh!"] If anything could induce him to advocate the suppression of street music, it would be the cries of "Oh!" from some hon. Gentlemen, for sounds more resembling those of a barrel organ out of tune he had never heard; but he should be sorry to put a stop even to the discordant exclamations of the opponents of the Bill by so arbitrary and tyrannical a measure as the present.

MR. ADDERLEY said, the principle of the Bill was admitted by the present legislation. The question was its adaptation to what might be called the German crusade, and the prevention of twenty or thirty trumpets blowing a blast into the windows of houses in many of the streets of the metropolis. He thought they might pass the second reading, and reserve the discussion for the Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must take issue with the last speaker, and contended that while the principle of the existing law was reasonable, the principle of the Bill was most unreasonable. The principle of the existing law was that for reasonable cause any street musician might be stopped and sent away by the police; but the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) wished to substitute for a reasonable cause the purely arbitrary veto of a single individual. He believed that if the Bill passed in its present shape it would authorize him to require a policeman to disperse the band which now played every evening within fifty yards of his windows, and the performances of which were attended by and amused from 2,000 to 3,000 persons. He thought those who attended concerts and the opera were not good judges of what amused the people in that respect. The Bill, in short, was an unwarrantable interference with the amusements of the people, and there was nothing unreasonable in the demand that it should be discussed at an earlier hour.

MR. BUTT begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Butt.)

MR. HUNT supposed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer opposed the Bill as a friend of the Italian cause, forgetting that Savoy had recently been annexed to France, and that barrel-organs were not included in the French Treaty. For his own part, he objected to all discordant sounds, even though they might come from the Treasury Bench, and his ear had been offended by hearing the Home Secretary say he was in favour of the second reading, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he was decidedly opposed to it; and the President of the Board of Trade appeared to be the same. He had no wish to interfere with the amusements of the people, and if there were a class fond of street music, in the name of Heaven let them have it; but he maintained that if the inhabitants of any particular street did not want to be driven crazy by the sounds of a barrel-organ, they should be permitted to send the grinder away. All that was intended by the Bill was to prevent those men from wandering into streets where their discordant sounds were not appreciated, but where they levied the greatest amount of black mail. As to the case of the band playing near the Chancellor of the Exchequer's house, that scarcely came within the ordinary definition of street music. At any rate, if all street musicians performed as well, he would never wish to send them away. He hoped the hon. Member for Derby would persevere with his Bill. He was as anxious as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the tastes of the people should be consulted, but he denied that the tastes of the people required the music which it was proposed to remove.

MR. BASS said, he would not now enter on the principle of the Bill, as he had already given an assurance that a full opportunity of debating it would be allowed on the Motion to go into Committee. To show the necessity for legislation on this subject, he would mention an incident in which he himself was concerned. At eight o'clock that morning, while at breakfast, he was put out of humour by a street band; at nine, when reading The Times, another struck up; and at ten, when he was engaged in his correspondence, a band of trumpets and trombones came under his window and blew a blast which shook his very house. His patience broke down under the last infliction, and he told his servant to ask the band to withdraw. The latter, however, declined, and when the policeman was asked to interfere he replied that his instructions were to do nothing unless the servant could say that his master was dangerously ill or dead. He was so astonished at that statement that he made his man write it down on paper and return with it to the constable for confirmation. He even went to the policeman himself, and ascertained that he had given the answer attributed to him. He had also an interview with Sir Richard Mayne on the subject, who said that the constable had somewhat exaggerated his instructions; but he believed that the man had done so to a very slight extent. Sir Richard assured him that it was impossible to put in force the present law in regard to street music. He hoped the House would read the Bill a second time.

MR. COLLINS said, he hoped that the debate would be adjourned. He should oppose the Bill. It would interfere most tyrannically with the amusements of the people.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he trusted that the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill for putting down the abominable nuisance of street organs. He happened to live next door to a religious club, and regularly every Saturday morning an Italian came and played the 100th Psalm on a hand organ. He sent his servant out on one occasion to request the man to vary the psalm; but he said he had not another in his repertoire. The evil was not felt in poor neighbourhoods so much as in the large streets and squares. Reference had been made to Ireland, but he believed that organ-grinders never went there. Certainly they would never dream of going to Youghal, where they could have no chance of levying black mail.

Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

CHAIN CABLES AND ANCHORS BILL.

(NO. 101.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that nothing had tended more to the destruction of ships in the merchant service, and the consequent loss of life, than the use of defective anchors and cables. In proof of this he would refer to the Report written by Admiral Dundas when in command of our fleet in the Black Sea, where, during the memorable storm that occurred on 14th of November, 1854, no fewer than thirty transports were lost through the parting of their cables, or the breaking of their anchors, while not one of Her Majesty's ships suffered seriously upon that occasion. The reason was, no doubt, that all the cables and anchors in the Royal service were rigorously tested; and the object of the present Bill was to introduce a similar security in the case of chains and cables used in the mercantile marine. He was convinced the measure was calculated to confer great benefit upon the shipping interest. In one week of December, 1862, no fewer than 190 disasters occurred to our mercantile marine on the English coast, and he believed that in all those cases the vessels were injured or lost entirely from the use of bad anchors and cables. The provisions of the Bill were no more than were necessary to secure the object in view. It had been suggested that a clause should be inserted to exempt the Trinity Board from the operation of the Bill; but it was peculiarly desirable that the Trinity Board should possess good anchors and cables in order that the light ships stationed on the sands and shoals of the coast should preserve their position. It was said that the Trinity Board tested their anchors and cables; but so did some of the great manufacturers who might equally claim exemption with the Trinity Board. He hoped, therefore, that the Bill would pass in its present form; but of course if a case were made out, the Bill might undergo alteration in Committee.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.—
(The Earl of Hardwicke.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he thought the Bill was likely to prove an extremely useful one. It was perfectly true that many of the disasters which occurred in our mercantile marine arose from the use of defective anchors and cables, and many of these evils might be prevented by applying to all vessels a test similar to that to which they had recourse in the Royal Navy. The Bill had been considered in the other House of Parliament in the course of two Sessions, and a select Committee to whom it had been referred had reported unanimously in its favour. As to the claim of the Trinity Board for exemption, this would form a proper subject for consideration in Committee.

Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE, in rising to call the attention of the House to the Letter of Sir Richard Bromley to the Duke of Somerset, on the Reform of the Government of Greenwich Hospital, said that they must remember with gratitude that so noble a building had been founded by a Queen of England, and that it was supported by revenues which had been bequeathed to it as a provision for worn-out and disabled mariners. He believed he might place this Hospital at the head of the charitable institutions of the country. Its wealth was enormous. It possessed in the Three per Cent Consols £1,144,450, in the Three per Cent reduced £1,485,912, New Three per Cent £99,462, and in the Two-and-a-Half per Cent £8,800, making a total capital in the funds of £2,738,625. It had lent on mortgage to the Woolwich and Greenwich Trust £1,604; in Cumberland, £28,128; on an estate in Northumberland, £18,000; and to the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1861, £20,000; making in all,

£2,906,358. It also possessed a landed estate yielding £49,611 per annum, which if capitalized might be fairly estimated at £1,200,000. From the mines in Cumberland it derived a yearly income of £7,663. From Greenwich rents it obtained £4,000 a year; from the market at Greenwich £130; annuity from Consolidated Fund, £20,000; freight of treasure, £6,000; making an annual revenue of £30,130. It had therefore, in all, an estate of nearly £5,000,000. But, unfortunately, this fine institution was sick, and the malady from which it was suffering was one under which it had laboured for many years. It might be aptly described as a house divided against itself. In 1860 a Royal Commission reported upon the state of the charity, and a Bill was brought into Parliament for the purpose of remedying the evil complained of; but the Bill was withdrawn. From that period nothing whatever had been done. Recently, however, the noble Duke, the first Lord of the Admiralty, seemed to have resolved to take some action, and he appointed Sir Richard Bromley to inquire into its condition and report accordingly. Now, if any document could demonstrate to what an extent the institution was demoralized, it was the report of Sir Richard Bromley. His object in bringing the subject forward was to elicit from the noble Duke, the First Lord of the Admiralty, his views upon the Report. After stating an instance in which he had attempted to introduce a change for the better, Sir Richard Bromley said—

“This is not a solitary instance of my endeavour to establish a better feeling of accord between the civil and military authorities at the Hospital, whereby much useless and acrimonious correspondence might be avoided, and the ordinary business of the institution be conducted at Greenwich, leaving the most important question only to be considered at the Admiralty. The abolition of the reference of papers to and fro, and the consequent saving of time and simplification of business at the Admiralty, would be also an important consideration. Under these circumstances, I assure your Grace it will be useless to attempt to simplify the business at Greenwich Hospital, and adapt its machinery to the usage and economical practice of the present day, unless the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners for the complete amalgamation of the military and civil authorities be carried into effect, and the double system of government which now prevails at Greenwich, and has outlived the times, be put an end to.”

After suggesting the amalgamation of the military and civil authorities, Sir Richard Bromley proceeded to say—

"Let the amalgamation take place, and the reforms will be comparatively easy to effect; and from my long experience as Secretary to the Audit Board, when the accounts of Greenwich Hospital passed in review before me for many years, and from my knowledge of the manner in which the accounts are now kept at Greenwich, I shall feel it my duty as a trustee to place them upon a sound system of double entry, even should the old system be continued for a time; and I will take care that sounder checks are established for the due security of the funds and property of the institution than those which now exist."

Mr. Tierney and Vice Admiral Richards, in a Report to the Secretary of the Admiralty, complained of the course adopted by Sir Richard Bromley, and stated their conviction that if his plan were carried out the result would be seriously injurious to the interests of the institution. They said—

"The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty will doubtless fully appreciate the peculiar difficulty of our position, as well as the motives which induce us to refrain from making any comments upon the most unusual step of a single member of a Board framing a long and laborious Bill of indictment against his brother Commissioners, and urging the necessity of their extinction as the only means of effecting any real reform in the institution—a reform which he pronounces impossible to carry out in the face of their prejudice and obstruction."

In 1864 it is now proposed, by a singular process of reasoning, to destroy the existing constitution, in the working of which the most hostile and unscrupulous tongues and pens have never ventured to breathe a suspicion of peculation or dishonesty, and which has largely added to the resources inherited from its predecessor. We may fairly be entitled to ask, where are the grounds for making this great and serious change?"

The spectacle was presented of one Commissioner making recommendations to which the other two Commissioners were decidedly opposed. Then, again, there was the evidence of the distinguished officer who was the Governor of the institution, who, referring to the document put forth by the two Commissioners, said, that however specious in theory it might be, there could be no doubt as to the evils which resulted from having two antagonistic authorities. The objections to the present system were well known, and the question was, what remedy could be applied for them. Their Lordships, as possessors of property, knew that the due management of the Hospital funds was really a very simple matter if proper steps were taken. It was a disgrace to the country that a great national institution should have been for so long liable to the heavy complaints which had been brought against Greenwich Hospital. The country desired that our seamen should receive the benefits of an institution which had been expressly designed for them; that those who raised our revenues by commerce in time of peace, and who defended them in time of war, should have the benefit of the very best management that could be devised. He, therefore, wished to ask the noble Duke whether he was prepared to state the intentions of the Government with respect to the future management of Greenwich Hospital?

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he could assure the noble Earl that he, in common with all of their Lordships, fully shared in the earnest desire that the funds of Greenwich Hospital should be applied in the best possible manner for the benefit of those for whom it had been established. There had been for many years complaints made of the management of Greenwich Hospital. Some of the evils complained of belonged to the administration, and if they were examined it would be found that some were incidental to the nature of the institution. The Hospital was originally founded by Queen Mary for disabled seamen who were incapacitated by age or by wounds from obtaining a living by their own exertions. Afterwards, when the large Derwentwater estates were added to the property of the Hospital, it was thought that increased scope should be given to the institution. Accordingly the benefits of the Hospital were extended to a class of men who received a certain weekly pension, but who were not wholly incapacitated or disabled. Indeed many of them were perfectly able, and were at a time of life when they could occupy themselves in employments. Some of them were married. Endeavours were made to meet the requirements of all classes, and to make the Hospital as agreeable as possible; but the very nature of the building, with large halls and long corridors, unfitted it as a place of residence for married men. It was therefore impossible to allow the men's wives to live in the Hospital; and accordingly the men lived there while their wives lived outside. The men were allowed to carry their dinners out of the Hospital. That arrangement led to a very unsatisfactory state of things, and produced many complaints from pensioners and their wives. When he first accepted his present office, the subject was brought to his notice, and he appointed a Commission to inquire into the facts. Those Commissioners made an able report, and recommended certain additional allowances to the men, suggested a division of the building to make separate houses for the married men, and further recommended that the governing body should be changed, and a special officer appointed to manage the finances of the institution. He (the Duke of Somerset) brought in a Bill to carry out those recommendations; but it was not received with favour by the noble Earl opposite, nor, indeed, by many of their Lordships. It was felt that the interest of the officers who at present enjoyed advantages from Greenwich Hospital ought not to be wholly ignored in any future re-arrangement of the institution. He admitted there was force in that view; but the Bill was withdrawn because, by the practice of Parliament, it ought to have originated in the other House. Since then, however, he had determined to see whether he could not carry out such of the recommendations of the Commissioners as did not require the sanction of an Act of Parliament. The pensions had been increased, married men received larger allowances, and a variety of small changes had been made, but the best and most deserving class of men were still unwilling to enter the Hospital. Sir Richard Bromley, who had been appointed the Civil Commissioner, in the report which had been referred to by the noble Earl, showed that a very unsatisfactory state of things prevailed in the Hospital, and he recommended that a change should be effected with regard to the civil and military elements in the management of the Hospital. It then became evident that it would be necessary to go further than had been recommended by the Commissioners. The reason for the double government which had been so much complained of was, that with the large funds belonging to the Hospital it was felt that it would not be right to intrust the uncontrolled management of those funds to the same officers who had the distribution of them. He had felt that it would be necessary to go even beyond the recommendation of the Commissioners, and to separate entirely the management of the income from the management of the Hospital. The business of the one was quite distinct from the business of the other. There was another question — whether they should bring seamen to the Hospital who were still able to take other employment, or whether it was not much better that they should live in the ports and maritime places where all their friends and relations were, rather than force them into a sort of monastic establishment. Instead of fitting up the long corridors of the Hospital, or building model cottages for the comfortable reception of the pensioners, he thought it would be much wiser to keep the Hospital strictly to the purpose originally intended — namely, an infirmary with a helpless ward — and apply the income of the Hospital in increasing the pensions of the seamen elsewhere. One of the recommendations of the Commissioners was, that the pensioners should be allowed to go and visit their friends, their expenses being paid; but surely it would be much better that the pensioners should live along with their friends. In that way they would be enabled to provide for a class of seamen whose services it was most desirable to reward; for the best class of seamen preferred to live with their families, and would not come to the Hospital unless they were in a state of destitution. With some little additional income they would be enabled to live among their friends and have there both occupation and amusement. To show the position to which they were coming under the present management of Greenwich Hospital, he would observe that one of the recommendations of the Commissioners was that every sort of amusement should be invented to induce the men to remain at Greenwich; and one suggestion was that some part of the Hospital should be fitted up like the deck of a ship, and that they should be provided with a fiddler every evening, and that they should have lectures on different subjects. He did not think that was the way in which to treat seamen, but that it would be much better to provide them additional means of living among their friends. Without going into details, he might say that, after reading and considering the report, he had prepared a memorandum on the subject explaining what he thought should be the future management of the Hospital, restricting it to the purpose of an infirmary. It was admitted that the infirmary was an admirable institution, worthy of the generosity and liberality of the country. It was conducted in the best possible manner. He proposed to retain the infirmary; and also the schools, which had been improved during the last three years, and which he believed were now working very well. These schools were a great boon to seamen; their sons received there an education which fitted them at once for Her Majesty's service, the mercantile service, or any other situation in life. He also proposed to keep a certain portion of the Hospital, so that, in the event of war, they should have a hospital for seamen close to the water. As to the rest of the building, and the best mode of using it, he should like to take some further time to consider that point. The outline of this plan would leave a surplus which has been estimated at £70,000 or £80,000 a year, which would be applied in the best manner for the relief and encouragement of seamen, and a certain portion would be laid aside to meet the claims of officers on the Hospital. By these means they would be enabled to effect more good in the Hospital than had been effected in past years. He had prepared, as he had stated, a memorandum on the subject; and, if the noble Earl would move for it, he should be happy to lay it on the table.

The Earl of COLCHESTER and the Earl of SHREWSBURY and TALBOT made some observations which were not heard.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE replied, observing that he thought it would be very much better financially that a large number of the in-pensioners should be out-pensioners.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, there was one point mentioned by the noble Duke which required some explanation. As he understood him, he proposed to divert a certain portion of the funds of the Hospital for the purpose of rewarding persons who had deserved well of their country. To reward such persons might be very desirable; but it was not quite clear that it should be done by the diversion of funds set apart for a different object. Such a proposal demanded careful consideration.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that in selecting the seamen who were to receive pensions, they would select them from that class who would be entitled to enter the Hospital. There were many excellent seamen who quite deserved to be admitted to the Hospital, but who did not like to go there. Last year, some £12,000 had been devoted from the surplus funds of the Hospital to make provision for the widows of sailors who had been drowned in the service.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, that one of the original objects contemplated in the charter of the institution was the benefit of the merchant seamen. That object, he thought, ought not to be entirely lost sight of. Considering the national importance of our mercantile marine, and the relation it bore to the Royal Navy, it was most desirable that some mode of bridging over the interval between the two in this matter should be adopted.

THE ARMISTICE.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I take this opportunity of making an inquiry of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, with reference to the statement which he made last night respecting the continuance of the suspension of arms. I understood that there was to be a further continuance of the suspension of hostilities for one fortnight, dating from to-morrow. I wish to know to what day now the Conference is adjourned; and also whether the suspension of hostilities for the space of one fortnight was connected with any conditions which might account for that particular duration of the armistice?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I cannot at the present moment say why the suspension of hostilities was limited to that particular period. That particular duration was not dependent on any conditions, but was the limit of suspension to which the Danish Government agreed. The other parties wished for a longer suspension, but only a fortnight's suspension was agreed to.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, as seccay was so little observed by other parties to the Conference that the intelligence communicated to that House yesterday was known at Berlin was telegraphed back to this country before it was communicated to the House, he felt relieved from any obligations with respect to reticence. He wished therefore to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is understood that no further extension of the armistice will be pressed upon Denmark by the British Government, in case the Conference should not come to a final agreement within the limits of the additional fortnight to which the duration of Conference is now extended?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I may be able to answer any question of fact, as, for instance, with respect to the extent of the armistice; but I really am not able to give an answer as to what the Conference may do in cases which are yet to come.

EDUCATION—COMMITTEE ON INSPECTORS' REPORTS.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he will undertake that none of the witnesses who may be examined before the Committee on Inspectors' Reports shall suffer any prejudice to their official position and prospects, so far as the Council Office is concerned, on account of any evidence which they may give before that Committee?

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, it was evident that in giving the undertaking which the noble Lord required, the Committee of Council were incurring the risk of being obliged to retain in a post of great importance an officer who, from his own statements and admissions, might have proved himself unworthy of the trust. At the same time he believed it had never been the practice of any department to allow one of its officers to suffer for evidence given by him with respect to the Acts of that department; and as, in the present case, it was important that in an inquiry affecting the character and honour of a department the evidence of an officer of that department should be given freely and without any fear of personal consequences, the Committee of Council did not consider that they would be right in withholding their consent to the undertaking required by the noble Lord. At the same time it should be clearly understood, that that concession was confined strictly within the limits indicated by the Question of the noble Lord.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I should be glad to know when the Committee is likely to sit, as I understand the noble Lord (Lord Robert Cecil) and the Lord Advocate have been appointed assessors. It is well known that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate is daily engaged in the Yelverton appeal case, and I should like to know if the Committee is to await the settling of that appeal, or whether any arrangement has been made.

MR. H. A. BRUCE: The Committee is summoned for Monday next, and then the necessary arrangements will be made.

INDIAN PENSIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Secretary of State for India, last evening to state, when the question relative to Lady Elgin's pension was before the House, that pensions granted out of the Indian revenue are not submitted to Parliament. He would now beg to ask if there is not a provision in the Act of 1858 under which all pensions and charges on the Indian revenue are to be laid before Parliament within fourteen days.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: No doubt the pension would be laid before Parliament. What he stated was, that it was not necessary that it should be submitted for the Vote of Parliament.

ARMY—MARRIED SOLDIERS' QUARTERS, ALDERSHOT.—QUESTION.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the promise made in the last Session of Parliament, that the quarters of the married soldiers at Aldershot should be separated, has been carried into effect?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON replied, that the arrangements for the improved accommodation of the married soldiers in different camps had in some cases been carried out, and in other cases were in course of being carried out. The arrangements which had been in operation were that five or six families should be lodged in one hut. In some cases the quarters were separated by boarding, and in others only by canvas. Now, however, a sum of money had been taken in the Estimates for separating those quarters in a more permanent manner. It was intended that not more than four families should occupy one hut, and a chimney should be erected in the centre, so that each family might have a separate fireplace. The families would then be completely by themselves, and although he could not say that sufficient money had been taken to carry out all the arrangements in the present year, still he believed very great progress would be made towards that object.

COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

RESOLUTION.

LORD ROBERT CECIL rose to move—

"That in the opinion of this House it is expedient that the duty of ascertaining the facts upon which legislation in respect to Private Bills is to proceed should be discharged by some tribunal external to this House."

He feared he had but little chance in the present state of public feeling upon the great and important national questions which occupied their attention, of successfully inviting the attention of the House to the comparatively humble subject which he desired to bring before them. If it had anything in it that could commend it to the attention of hon. Members it was the fact that it had reference to their personal comfort and the ease with which they might perform their Parliamentary duties. Few of those who heard him but had personally suffered from the system of legislation on Private Bills as it existed. The Treasury Bench was, he believed, exempt from serving on Private Bill Committees, as, also, were those hon. Gentlemen who occupied an analogous position on that (the Opposition) side of the House. Gentlemen advanced in years were likewise free from the necessity of discharging the onerous duties to which he alluded. But with these exceptions every hon. Member had been forced at one time or another to take part in those duties. What he wished to point out was this, that a feeling against the existing system was generally prevalent, and that there was to be found a remedy for the evil which the House would easily be able to put into operation. He appealed to the experience of hon. Gentlemen themselves. That experience would afford him ample testimony to the inconvenience of having, in addition to the performance of their public duties, to occupy a great part of their time in discharging duties which more properly belonged to another tribunal. He hoped that hon. Gentlemen would not run away with the idea that when they sacrificed themselves in order to do the duties which fell upon them in consequence of the system they thereby earned any considerable title to the affection of their fellow countrymen. He was afraid the fact was quite the reverse; for the discontent outside the House with the system was general. When he last brought forward the question he referred to a petition from the Associated Chambers of Commerce, presented by the hon. Member for Bradford, in which the system of Private Bill legislation was denounced in the strongest terms. Since then the Associated Chambers had met again and expressed their opinion in terms so distinct that he would quote them to the House, and he would remind hon. Gentlemen that these Chambers of Commerce represented the classes principally interested in the successful and just performance of that particular duty. They represented the commercial classes, who chiefly came before the Committees of that House to ask protection for commercial undertakings or to resist alleged encroachments on their rights. The Associated Chambers of Commerce had passed a resolution, in which they stated that the present system of Private Bill Legislation was expensive and inefficient, and interfered with the course of public business; and they recommended that a superior court should be constituted, consisting of judges, with the requisite professional and engineering information. Not only was that resolution passed, but a debate took place, and he would refer to what fell from a gentleman representing the Hull Chamber of Commerce, in order to give to hon. Members an idea of the appreciation in which their labours on private committees were held. That gentleman (Mr. Norwood) said that he was concerned, as chairman of a proposed dock company, in a Bill which three years ago was a long time before a Committee of the House of Commons, consisting of five gentlemen, four of whom had no knowledge of commercial matters; and such was the ignorance displayed by them of the matter under consideration, that after being examined for a considerable period to show the necessity for the formation of a graving dock, he heard to his great mortification one Member of the Committee say to another, "What does he mean by a graving dock?" to which question the other replied, "I am sure I do not know, but I suppose it is something relating to ships." Considerable expense (Mr. Norwood added) was caused by the ignorance of Committees, who often took a great deal of evidence which had nothing to do with the matter before them, and it was owing to their want of knowledge on special subjects that they allowed themselves to be brow-beaten, as they sometimes were, by the Parliamentary agents and counsel. It was apparent, from the resolution passed at that meeting, and from the speeches by which it was supported, that the commercial classes were not very fond of this particular jurisdiction, which inflicted so much inconvenience on Members of that House. He knew that he should be told that the House of Commons was jealous of that jurisdiction, and that every considerable authority was against depriving the House of the power it had so long exercised. That was a mistake, however, for no authority could be found in support of the existing system. A Committee sat on the subject last year, and many competent witnesses were heard before it. He would not refer to their evidence, but simply mention the names of those who condemned the system. Among these witnesses were Mr. Rickards, the speaker's counsel, Lord Redesdale, Mr. Massey, Lord Grey, Mr. Adair, Mr. May, and Colonel Wilson Patten. He did not say that all agreed in the remedy which he proposed, but they all concurred in the opinion that the present system was bad, and according to their several characters, they expressed an opinion in stronger or milder terms, but they agreed that the present system did not give to the parties that justice for which they paid, and to which they had a right. The matter had at last come to a crisis, the machinery had broken down, and hon. Members felt the evil of the call made upon them. He need not remind the House how difficult it had been during the Session to carry on both the public and private business. Persons out of doors had noticed how often the deliberation of the House had been interrupted by what was called a "count out," and they attributed the circumstance to the indolence of hon. Members. If the public really knew the burdens which hon. Members had to bear, they would form a more charitable judgment. It was not merely the public business that had broken down, but the private business was coming to an equal dead lock. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson Patten) told him that his difficulty was increasing daily, and that he was afraid of passing before an open window lest he should be thrown out of it by indignant private Members lurking about. The position of the hon. Member was like that of a familiar of the Inquisition in olden times in respect to Moors and Jews; and private Members looked on the hon. and gallant Gentleman as a man who could take away their liberty and shut them up for three or four weeks. The useless labour imposed on the hon. Member for North Lancashire and the Committee of Selection to maintain an inefficient system would, he believed, have amply sufficed to discharge all the functions which the House had any occasion to perform in reference to Private Bills. He had stated that there was no authority who said that the present system was satisfactory; but he was wrong, for there was in the blue-book, containing the evidence given last year, the testimony of a certain number of witnesses who asserted that the system was everything that was satisfactory. It was a curious phenomenon, for which he did not attempt to account, that this testimony was given entirely by Parliamentary agents and counsel. Perhaps a little light was thrown on this matter by the hon. and gallant Member for North Lancashire, who stated in his evidence that—

"The great defect of the present system is that there is no single individual who appears before the Committee who has not a direct pecuniary interest in prolonging the proceedings."

That possibly might, in some degree, account for the support given by the parties he had named to a system which every other authority most unflinchingly condemned. The House would naturally ask him what plan he had to suggest in place of the existing system. It was not, of course, for him to furnish information on that point in detail, and he needed only to point out principles on which a remedy might be based, leaving to others who had opportunity and official knowledge to fill up the details. He had gone through a good deal of the minutes of evidence taken before Private Bill Committees, with the view of ascertaining whether a portion of their labours might not be transferred to some other tribunal. The issue presented by every Private Bill was very simple. On one side there was to be considered the injury done to private individuals, and, on the other hand, the advantage to the public from the project contemplated. The balance had then to be struck in order to see which outweighed the other; but before that point was arrived at, there was an enormous amount of facts to be proved, and a great deal of time was wasted in ascertaining those preliminary facts. For instance, on a Water Bill, which had occupied a great deal of time this Session, and which desired to bring water to a population. It might drain certain lands, interfere with mills, or it might interfere with existing companies. There were three opponents to deal with—the old water companies, the people to be supplied, and those whose stream was injured. A great part of the labour of the Committee was devoted, however, to such questions as these:—The amount of population, the present supply of water, the exact nature of the scheme, the distance of the sources, the volume of the contemplated supply, the size and safety of the reservoirs, the area of the gathering ground, the height of the hills, the angle of the fall, the rainfall of the district, the chemical composition of the water, and the estimates of expenses. These were all simple facts. They were not matters of opinion. They could all be ascertained by an engineer going to the spot, and when once ascertained could admit of no doubt. If the opposing party chose to appoint an arbitrator, the two could decide whether the facts were true or not without any expense or labour on the part of the Members of the House, and without any danger of their decision being called in question. It was the same with railways. There were gradients, curves, distances, configuration of surface, the geological character of the ground, the estimate of the work. These were the items which now occupied the time of the Committee, and which might be easily disposed of by a scientific arbitration. In one Committee on a Water Works Bill, he remembered hours being consumed in inquiring into the safety of the reservoir. Was that a subject for the consideration of Members of the House?

Was it not rather a subject that could be more fitly abandoned to an engineer? The same with regard to railways. He remembered a whole day being spent in an inquiry into the nature of the ground through which a tunnel was to pass. Surely that labour might have been spared to the Committee. Besides these questions of fact there were questions of opinion. The traffic between place and place, and the injury done to individuals. Those were points upon which scientific men could not judge, and which ought to be decided by a tribunal, such as a jury empanelled on the spot, or that recommended by the associated chambers of commerce, rather than by five Members of the House of Commons. The damage done by a railway after a Bill was passed was left to be decided by a jury, and by the same analogy, the injury done before the Bill passed, should be decided also by a similar tribunal. He had no wish that any Gentleman who took the same side as himself should assent to all the details of his Motion. All he wished was that private Members should unite with him in condemning the system as a whole, in pressing the matter on the attention of the Government, and intimating to them that they must undertake the duty of remedying it. The truth was that, unless private Members took the matter up, nothing would ever be done. It was not the interest of official Members to do anything—they were free from the burden. The argument constantly urged whenever an attempt was made to induce Members to abandon the system was, that the House of Commons was jealous of its prerogative, and would not part with it. He believed that such an argument was a libel on the House of Commons. The House of Commons would readily part with any jurisdiction which had ceased to be useful to the public whom they represented. Any pride or pleasure that might have been felt in this jurisdiction had long since passed away under the heavy pressure which it imposed on private Members. He knew that he should be opposed by Members of great authority in these matters. He saw his noble Friend the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) taking notes, and his noble Friend had had more to do with imposing this weight on private Members than any other man: Delirunt reges plectuntur Achivi. When his noble Friend went mad, private Members were victimized. His noble Friend was an enthusiast for that particular kind of work, but his enthusiasm was confined to his own breast, and the mass of Members would gladly see a jurisdiction, against which suitors murmured, and the expense of which was a reproach to English jurisprudence, transferred to a more efficient tribunal, leaving their own energies free to perform those most important and larger duties with which they were charged by their constituents. The noble Lord concluded with his Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the duty of ascertaining the facts upon which legislation in respect to Private Bills is to proceed should be discharged by some tribunal external to this House,"—(Lord Robert Cecil.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he entirely concurred with the noble Lord in the description he had given of the labours hon. Members of that House had to perform during the Session in connection with private legislation. No doubt, the duties of representatives of the people of this country, both in reference to public and private business, must be heavy and laborious. The business of law-making in a country like this could not be done without labour or without great sacrifices. Law-making must be founded on deliberate and anxious inquiries—and private Bill legislation was a form of law-making. It was, in fact, the making of exceptional laws for cases which were not provided for by the general law of the country. If the general law of the country could be reduced to such a form that everybody could do those things now requiring special legal sanction under certain conditions laid down beforehand, there would be no need for Private Bill legislation; but until that could be done, Parliament was obliged to pass exceptional laws for particular cases, and he was one of those who believed that these exceptional powers ought to be given only by Parliament. They were matters of judgment, discretion, and expediency; and it was for Parliament to consider, after an investigation of its own, whether the facts made out justified it in rejecting or passing the proposals made to it. The noble Lord had hardly fairly described the qualities of Members of that House for deciding matters brought before them in Committees; nor did he think there was so much dissatisfaction amongst the public with the manner in which Parliament had performed this duty. Improvements, undoubtedly, might be made in the mode of bringing business before the Committees, and also in the mode in which the business was conducted; but there was not that general dissatisfaction with the Parliamentary tribunal which the noble Lord had described. Though the noble Lord had said that many of the witnesses condemned these Parliamentary tribunals, he had not informed the House what was the finding of the Select Committee who heard those witnesses on one side and the other. [LORD ROBERT CECIL: The Report was only carried by a majority of one.] There was a small majority, but he thought it was carried by more than one vote. The Chairman did not vote. The opinion of the Committee was this:—

"That having regard to the character of the questions which arise on the consideration of contested Private Bills, your Committee is disposed to concur with the view entertained by the majority of the witnesses, that no court of inquiry could be constituted for the purpose of investigating such questions which, on the whole, would be so satisfactory to the public as Committees composed of the Members of the Houses of Parliament."

The noble Lord named many eminent gentlemen who had given evidence condemnatory of the present system; but nearly every one of those gentlemen proposed to form his new tribunal in some way or other out of the old ingredients. The Members were to be Members of Parliament or Peers. Take the case of Lord Redesdale, to whom the noble Lord had referred. He would have had a Committee composed of two Commoners and one Peer, and they were to sit before the commencement of the Session of Parliament and to eliminate from the measures proposed to be laid before Parliament such as in their judgment ought not to be passed, allowing the rest to be carried in the ordinary way. Then take the case of the hon. Member for Ipswich. His proposition was to leave the Committees as they were with the exception that he would appoint a paid Chairman—a plan which he thought would ensure the duties being performed under an increased sense of responsibility. The other hon. Gentlemen named by the noble Lord, all of them, contemplated the ultimate decision coming to Parliament. They all agreed that whatever external tribunal there might be there must be an appeal to Parliament. Then, if there was an appeal to the House of Commons, what would the House do? Would the whole House entertain it? No; they would hand the question to a Select Committee, and the interested parties would have to be heard by counsel. [Lord ROBERT CECIL: No, no.] Was it probable that in those great struggles, in which the main question was whether old companies should retain possession of a district or new companies should be admitted to compete with them, any Judge would endeavour to stop persons from proceeding further who had a right of appeal to the House of Commons? On the contrary, he would say at once, "this is a question for Parliament to decide, involving, as it does, points of expediency and discretion." That being so, the battle would after all, in all great questions, be fought within the walls of that House; and all that would be effected by establishing such external tribunals as were proposed was, that one stage more would be added to the conflicts which took place—one more source of expense. There had, he might add, been something like an attempt to provide for Private Bill legislation by means of such preliminary inquiries before external tribunals. A Committee, which sat in 1853, and of which his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) was Chairman, made a report in which were set forth the failures which had attended the attempts made to control the action of Parliament by preliminary inquiry. The first who tried was Mr. Huskisson, and he failed; next came Lord Dalhousie; and in 1844 the Government of Sir Robert Peel proposed a scheme to determine what plan should be adopted in reference to the subject; but Parliament refused to be controlled by those preliminary inquiries. He did not, he might add, quite understand the plan of the noble Lord. His Resolution was—

Did the noble Lord propose that the facts and the evidence were to be taken before one court, and that the decision upon those facts and that evidence was to be pronounced by another? Were the facts to be ascertained by some judicial body, and then the preamble of the Bill to be settled by a Committee of the House of Commons?

The difficulty in such a case would be to define beforehand what a Committee would consider to be material in guiding its decision. If the facts which it was necessary to prove before the Committee could be settled beforehand, it would be quite possible, no doubt, to ascertain them by any process which it might be deemed right to adopt. Even then the Committee could not be precluded from examining further into those facts, because the inquiry before the Committee on a private Bill had no definite character. It was in the nature of an inquiry with the view to satisfying Members of Parliament whether it was expedient that certain powers should be given to the parties who applied for them, so that the facts to be ascertained could not be defined beforehand without great difficulty. If it were proposed that the Committee should meet first in order to consider what facts should be inquired into elsewhere, he did not think much time or labour would by such a plan be saved, or much expense or delay to the parties themselves avoided. The Committee would first assemble to decide what facts were material to the issue; a court would then set about the investigation of those facts; and then the Committee would have to meet a second time, to sift them as reported by the court, and see whether they establish the preamble. Let him take, by way of illustration of his argument, a proposition for the formation of a tunnel in Oxford Street, from the Marble Arch to Tottenham Court Road. What facts could in that case be ascertained for investigation by an external tribunal, with a view to their being laid before the Committee? The Committee, in exercising its inquisitorial power, would gradually understand the whole bearing of the question, and those facts would come out which appeared to be material for guiding them in their decision. The principle for which the noble Lord contended was, no doubt, acted upon to some extent at present, for instance, by the 150th Standing Order it was laid down that, in cases of amalgamation, certain things should be proved to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade; whether, for instance, the respective parties paid up a certain part of the capital ordered to be raised by means of shares and so forth. The Committee, supplied with those facts, took them as matters proved, and to that extent their labours were of course diminished. He was quite willing moreover to admit that, if it could be done, the lessening of those labours farther was an object which it would as far as possible be desirable to accomplish. Those, however, who had carefully considered the question, could hardly, he thought, see their way to the expediency of taking the jurisdiction over private business out of the hands of the House of Commons so clearly as the Chambers of Commerce to which the noble Lord referred seemed to do. It must be borne in mind that the proposals which came before the House in the shape of Private Bills changed with the times, and that they ought not, therefore, to be dealt with by a fixed body, apt to be guided by precedents; and to lay too much stress on consistency and uniformity. They ought rather to be judged of by the representatives of the people at the moment, and if the contrary course had been pursued, it was possible we might not have had a railway at all; or, at any rate, the railways would have been long delayed, for lawyers would naturally proceed upon the principles which he had just mentioned, and great obstacles would thus be thrown in the way of progress and improvement. Such a tribunal might have been astounded at the proposal to make the railway from Liverpool to Manchester. Lawyer-like they would have looked to consistency, and felt bound by precedent. He believed there was no body in the country fit to deal with these fluctuating and changeable questions like a representative body; and therefore he, for one, would not give his consent to the Resolution, if in the least it went to take away the jurisdiction of Parliament in these matters. Lawyers could tell the legal effect of certain facts, when facts were proved before them. A law being in existence, judicial bodies might apply the law to the facts; but he denied that judicial bodies were the proper parties to say what the policy of the country should be. It was not a question of administration but of legislation; and he thought it behoved the House not lightly to agree to any proposition which seemed like parting with its jurisdiction over the private legislation of the kingdom.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that after the satisfactory and conclusive statement of his right hon. Friend he should not have trespassed on the attention of the House were it not for the peculiar course which had been taken by the noble Lord below him in recommending his Resolution to the House. He regretted that the noble Lord had not contented himself with pointing out the defects of the present system of Private Bill legislation without seeking to cast so much odium not only on Committees of the House, but also on individuals composing those Committees. He had scarcely ever heard, for instance, so unjust and uncalled for an attack as the noble Lord had made on his noble Friend the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley). Did the noble Lord, he would ask, know the circumstances under which his noble Friend took upon himself the laborious duty of presiding over the Committee to which his observations pointed? His noble Friend had, at the end of last Session, come to him and stated that he was afraid he could not again undertake that duty, and it was only at his particular and earnest request that he consented to go through the labour which it imposed during the present Session. Yet the return which his noble Friend got was that the noble Lord sought to throw upon him the odium of the present system. [Lord ROBERT CECIL: I should be the very last person to do anything of the kind.] He was sorry if he had misunderstood the noble Lord, but he had, at all events, thrown odium on the Committees of that House, and had quoted statements made by somebody—nobody knew whom—as to what he had heard pass in conversation in a particular Committee between two of its Members. Now, if there was anything for which the Committees of the House on Private Bills were distinguished, it was for their impartiality and the painstaking manner in which they devoted themselves to the investigation of the cases which came before them. Although the commercial community complained of the way in which the business was conducted, it was the great railway bodies who, when another system was tried some years ago, brought back the present course of procedure by declaring their want of confidence in any tribunal except one constituted in Parliament. He had expressed an opinion before a Select Committee that certain facts might be ascertained elsewhere; but when he consulted with men of experience, such as the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, the hon. Member for Ipswich, and other Chairmen of Committees, he found that they were of opinion that the investigation could not be divided between Parliament and an external tribunal. The experiment of having a preliminary inquiry had already been tried without success, for it only doubled the expense without giving any satisfaction; and after two years' experience of it he felt compelled to move its abandonment. Perhaps some mode might yet be devised of holding a preliminary investigation; but unless the House had some practical scheme in view, it would be dangerous for it to pass a general Resolution leading the public to expect something which all their experience hitherto had proved impracticable. If his noble Friend really wished to have the matter taken up, he should move for another Committee, and place himself at the head of it. His noble Friend had alluded jocularly to the animadversions which were passed by hon. Members on the Committee of Selection; but he was bound to acknowledge seriously the great and valuable assistance they had derived from Members in conducting the private business of the country. He hoped the noble Lord would not press his Motion.

LORD STANLEY said, he felt bound to state that he did not understand his noble Friend to speak of him (Lord Stanley) in any other spirit than that of good humour, and he also wished to discuss the question in the same spirit. The House was indebted to his noble Friend for bringing forward the subject. He was the last person to deny that the manner in which the Private Bill legislation was conducted was capable of various amendments in detail. Fault-finding was easy; but the real question was, however, not whether the existing arrangements were perfect, but whether any other system could be substituted which would work better. As to the general dissatisfaction with which it was alleged the decisions of Committees were regarded, he could not admit it. It must be remembered that several rival interests were represented before a Committee, and it stood to reason that some of them must be defeated. Those parties whose hopes were disappointed not unnaturally left the Committee not particularly well pleased. What they had to consider was whether it was possible to transfer the decision of these cases from Parliament to any other tribunal. It was suggested that they might have a Board or Commission, which would be paid for its labours, would sit regularly, and would possess the advantage of greater experience and greater despatch. But the next point was whether this Commission was to give judgment with or without an appeal. If there was to be an appeal, it must be to the House or to a Committee, and in either event he did not see what would be gained. In every case, involving important pecuniary interests, the Bill would be fought to the last, and thus the result would be, if it were sent to a Committee, that an additional step would be added to the trial, with a corresponding increase of expense to the parties concerned. If, on the other hand, the decision rested with the House at large, he feared the consequence would be a mere scramble for Parliamentary influence. Or, lastly, if there was to be no appeal, they must consider the amount of absolute irresponsible power which would be placed in the hands of three or four permanent officials. Railway business to the amount of £30,000,000 or £40,000,000 annually came before Parliament. It was no answer to say that the Judges dealt with pecuniary interests quite as important. He admitted that; but a trial before one of the ordinary courts bore no resemblance to the trial of a Private Bill before a Parliamentary Committee. The Judge had a simple and definite issue before him. He had to decide whether, say, a property belonged to A or B, or whether the law had or had not been violated by certain persons. He had no arbitrary power or discretion. He had only to ascertain what the law was, and to apply it to the particular matter before him. But in the case of a Private Bill there was no fixed law. The issue was whether this or that company should make a line, but there was no right in the matter. It was merely a question whether it would be more for the public advantage that the one or the other should get authority to construct the line. It was impossible to deal with matters of that kind in a way which would not leave a large and arbitrary discretion in the hands of those with whom the decision rested, and on that ground the ultimate judgment could not safely be intrusted to any body apart from the House. It had been proposed, however, that the facts ascertained in the preliminary inquiry should be embodied in a report, or summary of evidence, which should be laid before the Committee, and upon which counsel should be allowed to argue, before the Committee came to a decision. Without absolutely condemning that plan, he would point out some difficulties which attended it. Whatever might be gained by the more methodical course of procedure in taking evidence, it was inevitable that the evidence would be exceedingly voluminous. Even omitting details which were unimportant, if not irrelevant, it would often happen that the testimony would fill a folio volume of several hundred pages; and there was no security that the Committee would master that printed statement as completely as they would learn the features of the case from listening to the witnesses day after day. He did not deny that that plan would save some time to the Committee, but when they took into account the length of the inquiry before the Commission, in addition to the trial before the Committee, they would see that the whole affair would last a great deal longer than now. It was to be remembered, too, that defeated parties would probably be dissatisfied with having decisions given against them by an unseen and unknown tribunal. There would not be the same conviction in their minds that their cases had been fairly gone into, as there was when they saw the witnesses examined in their presence and observed the Committees carefully watching the evidence. Such were the difficulties which appeared to him to stand in the way of the proposition now before the House.

The principal objections to the existing mode of transacting private business were three in number—the allegation of the uncertainty of decisions, the expense to the parties, and the labour imposed upon the Members of that House. His belief was that since the House had adopted the practice of limiting the number of chairmen, and thus throwing the main responsibility into fewer hands, the instances of contradictory decisions, so much complained of formerly, had, if not ceased to occur, been greatly diminished in number. The fact was, that even if all Private Bills were tried by some independent tribunal they never could have that uniformity of decisions which prevailed in courts of law; because, in dealing with Private Bills, there was no fixed law to administer, and the question of what was best for the public interests was necessarily a very vague and general one, upon which men of equal competence might come to different judgments in different cases. He was afraid, again, that they never would get rid altogether of unnecessary expense to the parties whatever mode of procedure might be adopted; but he thought that the promoters and opponents of Private Bills were themselves principally in fault. Other litigants proceeded at their own charges, but when Railway Companies fought one another upstairs, the shareholders paid the expenses, and the directors enjoyed the pleasure and excitement of the contest. He did not know why railway shareholders did not, as a general rule, exercise much control over their boards; but such was undoubtedly the case, and as long as one set of men spent the money and another found it, so long they could not expect economical administration. He believed, in the last place, that the labour imposed upon the Members of that House fell hard in some instances; but the evil lay not so much in the amount of the work as in the inequality with which it seemed to be divided. He had made some rough calculations on that subject—though he was afraid he could not vouch for their strict accuracy—from which it appeared that assuming from the total number of members 150 might be deducted as disabled by age, or exempted by station, and distributing the duty among 500 hon. Gentlemen, the average amount of labour devolving upon each did not come to more than eight days in the course of a year. Considering the magnitude of the interests involved, it could not, he submitted, be fairly said that that amount was excessive. At the same time he thought that some relief might be given in that respect. For example, he had never been able to understand why in ordinary cases there should be separate hearings before Committees of the two Houses of Parliament. When some time ago a joint Committee was appointed to consider the London Railway Bills, he was himself afraid that the experiment might not succeed, but the plan worked very well, and he had no doubt that in 99 cases out of every 100—for he presumed that each House would preserve the right of dealing separately with cases requiring special attention—one Committee might do the work for both Houses. That course would lessen the work to a considerable extent. Then he thought that the number of five members on Private Bill Committees was unnecessarily large. Last year he proposed to reduce it to three, and he was still inclined to hold that opinion. The objection urged against it was that in the event of any one of the three being disabled by illness, the whole of the responsibility would rest upon the Chairman. If the House were of opinion that that objection was of so much weight as to overrule the advantage of diminishing the number to three, then it might be reduced from five to four, the only disadvantage of which would be that in doubtful cases it would be necessary to give the Chairman a double vote. He had calculated in a rough way that the effect of these alterations would be to reduce the amount of labour imposed upon members by one-third. Such were the practical suggestions he had to offer, and he hoped they would be taken into consideration with any other amendments that might be proposed; but, meanwhile, he trusted the House would not proceed upon the unusual and unsatisfactory plan of passing a general Resolution, which condemned the existing system without substituting anything else in its place.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he concurred with a good deal of what had been said by the President of the Board of Trade, and by the noble Lord who had just sat down, upon this question. The Committees of the House of Commons with regard to private business, had assumed more and more the character of prophets than of judges. The facts were daily lessening, and the matter became one of speculation more than of judgment. He had reason to believe that if the House directed their rules to be more rigidly enforced, half of the burdens thrown upon Members would quickly disappear. It appeared from a return, that the sum lodged with the accountant general as deposits for railway schemes that year, amounted to £8,300,000. That was to be multiplied by 12½, to represent the capital involved in the decision of the Committees; so that nearly the sum of £80,000,000 was brought under the adjudication of Parliament. The first thing he would ask the House to consider was, how far the existing rules and regulations had been attended to. If their rules were not only not enforced, but were allowed to be set at defiance, he should feel little interest in any plan which might be proposed. They should first try what the enforcement of their rules would do before they rushed into a totally different and new system of proceeding. He dared to say the Committees did not give satisfaction to all parties, but he should be glad if in some respects they gave less satisfaction. If the present system should be found so bad as to be wholly incapable of enabling them to transact the business which came before them, then he would say reform it altogether. He thought the Chairmen of Committees, of whom he was one, might do something by coming to an understanding with each other on the subject of Standing Orders. At present, there seemed to be a considerable variation of opinion as to the degree in which the Standing Orders should be carried into effect.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he could not support the Resolution as it stood, as he was not prepared to give up the practice of taking viva voce evidence by the first tribunal before whom a case might come. The proceedings of the Committees, however, might be shortened in many ways; for instance, when a Bill originated in the House of Lords, a Committee took the evidence in full. When the Bill reached the House of Commons, why should they re-hear the whole of that evidence instead of accepting the printed evidence from the House of Lords, just as the two Houses recognized each others' blue-books on political subjects? When a Bill had come from the other House, he thought a Committee of three, instead of five, was sufficient to deal with it; and that, unless in the case of a special application, no evidence further than what had been heard before the Lords should be given. As to a tribunal external to the House, he thought, however carefully its inquiries might be conducted, its decisions would not be treated with very much respect by the House. Indeed, the scheme which was recommended by his noble Friend had been tried, and had completely failed. He remembered the case of an inquiry in the country on which a friend of his sat for six weeks, and then when the Bill came before the House the whole matter was gone into again before a Committee. The same was the case with reference to the inquiries under Lord Dalhousie and the Board of Trade, although they were so elaborate and so careful that nearly every recommendation which they made had, though rejected at the time, since been accepted by Committees of that House. He regretted that his noble Friend (Lord Stanley) should have so completely sacrificed himself to the conduct of private business that he was unable to sit upon public Committees, or to give the full advantage of his assistance in the proceedings of the House. The duty of serving upon Committees ought to be more equally distributed among the Members, and it would be well if no one would consent to do more than his share of it.

MR. LOWE said, that he had the greatest respect for the Committees of that House, the Members of which discharged a most onerous and ungrateful duty with great ability and the greatest integrity; but he did not think that full justice had been done to the evils of the existing system. The first objection was that a great amount of valuable labour was diverted from the public Committees and public business of the House to the performance of judicial functions, and judicial functions of by no means a high order. The second objection was that the Gentlemen who sat upon those Committees were in somewhat the same position as juries would be if they were called upon to administer the law without judges to assist them. They were gentlemen of ability and integrity, but they were in the hands of practised counsel, by whom they were addressed in artful and able speeches, and they had to perform many of the duties of a judge at Nisi prius without the training and practice which gave authority and facility to the decision of such judges. The proceedings before such a tribunal must necessarily be greatly prolonged, and such a prolongation caused enormous expense and led to a denial of justice to many persons, who had to put up with injuries of which they could not afford to complain. Nor must they look, as in ordinary cases, to the litigants to agitate for redress, because, although they did not say so, there was no doubt that the great railway companies regarded the enormous expense of these Parliamentary contests with complacency, as they looked upon it as a security for their maintenance of what they had got from the Legislature. Since the Committee system first came into operation, the theory upon which the Legislature dealt with joint-stock companies had greatly changed, and much time and labour would be saved if Committees, accommodating their practice to that change of principle, were to confine their inquiries, in the case of railway companies at all events, to those parts of the Bill which authorized companies to do something which they could not do without the authority of the Legislature. Then, although decisions were continually being given upon points which were of the greatest consequence to the public, no rule, no law was created. Although a judicial decision was of value to the litigants, it was of still greater use to the rest of the community, who steered their course by it, and were thus enabled to avoid litigation. Such a result was not, however, attained by the Committees of that House. One Committee did not know what another had done or was doing. No record was kept, although a point might have arisen twenty times before, it was treated as a case of first impression; and the same question was often decided by different Committees in diametrically opposite ways. The result was that no one knew when he was sure to maintain his right, and no one could tell that he might not overthrow it. This afforded a great encouragement to experiments, and was a great source of anxiety to those who were interested in established undertakings. If a judicial and permanent element were introduced into the Committees, their judgments would be reported and gathered together, and would form precedents which would guide future decisions. A hundred years ago it was thought that the mercantile law could not be reduced to rule, but Lord Mansfield took the matter in hand and accomplished it. At the present moment railway companies did not know on what terms they held their property. They did not know whether competition was a proper ground of opposition; so that there were some hundreds of millions sterling embarked in railway property, and no one knew on what security. Not only had the House no practical control in the matter, but it really knew less about railway business than about any other kind of business; and after twenty years' experience of the inconvenience and insecurity arising from this, we left things just where we had found them. He did not pretend to any great practical knowledge on the subject, but it struck him that there were several modes by which an improvement could be effected. He believed it would be an improvement if a single person took the evidence now taken by Committees, and reported it to the House, leaving it for parties to move for a Committee if a Committee was desired. Again, he imagined it would be a great improvement to have joint Committees of the two Houses, even if the evidence was still to be taken by Committees. He thought it would be an improvement if hon. Members consented to act as special jurors, and to be presided over by a judge, so that they would act like special jurors in a case at nisi prius. Then, he could imagine that there might be a Committee appointed to act in these cases as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council acted in appeal cases for the latter body. He believed there was no tribunal whose decisions gave more satisfaction than did those of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. He felt bound to express his opinion that Committees of the House of Commons, as then constituted, were not a satisfactory tribunal, and that some change was required in respect of their private legislation.

Mr. RICHARD HODGSON thought the decisions of Committees on Private Bills, although sometimes erroneous, were on the whole very satisfactory, and were much respected by the public. If an error was committed one Session, it could be remedied the next. No tribunal that he could imagine would pronounce decisions that would be equally satisfactory to the public. Turning to the Motion of the noble Lord, he did not see how, as was suggested, it would tend to save expense. True, the evidence as to the estimates connected with Private Bills might be taken by a Commission appointed by Government, or by the House of Commons; but evidence of that kind was open to dispute, and would frequently be required to be given again before the Committee at a great addition to the expense. It was the great expense of these inquiries that the country objected to. The fees which parties who came before the Committees were obliged to pay had been beyond all measure extravagant. Something had already been done in the way of reducing those expenses, and he hoped that still more would be effected in that direction, for by that means much of the dissatisfaction entertained against Private Bill legislation would be removed.

LORD HARRY VANE said, his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) had placed the matter in so clear a light, and he concurred so fully in his right hon. Friend's observations, that he should not have thought it necessary to address the House, only that the great weight of authority seemed to be, not only against the proposition of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, but also against any essential change in the present system. He concurred in thinking that the country was not so satisfied with the existing system, as some hon. Members seemed to suppose. A Select Committee was composed of Gentlemen some of whom might have a great knowledge of the subject to be considered, and others of whom might not have any knowledge of it at all. It was, therefore, an uncertain tribunal, and its decisions must be unsatisfactory, and lead to constant appeals to that House. He agreed with the President of the Board of Trade, that in a community like that of England, where opinions and interests were continually changing, it would be unwise to intrust to a fixed tribunal the powers administered by Parliamentary Committees; but it seemed to him that some one ought to be connected with a Committee who should give it a judicial character, and that it should be guided by some one of experience in the matter before it, as well as skilled in judicial investigation. It frequently happened that a great mass of evidence was taken by a Committee which had no bearing on the question. Counsel, Parliamentary agents, and solicitors had no interest in shortening the proceedings; and if the Chairman had not the moral courage to stop them, it often happened that they protracted the proceedings very unnecessarily. The suggestion of his right hon. Friend, therefore, was one of a practical character; and though it had been made before, was one worthy of consideration as likely to be of considerable advantage. The suggestion of the hon. Member for Leominster, that evidence should be taken once instead of twice, was one of which he approved; and if the Lords would consent to accept the evidence taken before a Committee of the House of Commons, and the House of Commons would adopt a corresponding rule, the proceedings would be shortened and a saving of expense effected. It should be borne in mind that the parties upon whom the expenses of proceedings before Parliamentary Committees ultimately fell were often not the litigants. There was a large class interested in litigation before the Committees, whose views consequently were not identical with those of the shareholders. Attention should, therefore, be directed as much as possible to the reduction of expenses. These would never be lessened unless the House took the matter in hand; and great credit, therefore, was due to the noble Lord for directing attention to a matter which was more thought of out of doors than hon. Members might be disposed to believe.

Mr. PAULL said, the Motion had called forth many interesting speeches from Gentlemen well qualified to pronounce opinions on the subject, but the noble Lord would see that it could not be expected to do more. His proposal to have one tribunal to take evidence, and another to decide upon it, was one which the House would never adopt. The noble Lord (Lord R. Cecil) was in error in assuming that the House and the Government had not grappled earnestly with this Question. There was no subject which had commanded more attention from the painstaking and practical Members than that of Private Bill legislation; and the fact that the grievances still continued showed how difficult it was to provide a remedy for them. Everybody admitted the evil, but it was the very magnitude of the grievance which led to its continuance. From many of the proposals made that evening he felt compelled to differ. He did not believe, for instance, that hon. Members would feel themselves satisfactorily placed under the guidance of a judge by whom their attention was to be directed to special issue. The training of the judicial mind would infallibly lead the judge to discard many of the innumerable issues which always presented themselves in the investigations of Private Bills, and thereby a great deal of matter would be excluded which yet might well deserve consideration. Members, moreover, coming, as they did, from various classes of society, would better appreciate the force of those issues than a single judicial mind could be expected to do. Again, he felt considerable doubts as to the propriety, in a constitutional point of view, of joint Committees of both Houses of Parliament. The subject had a right to petition both Houses of Parliament; and suppose a petition, setting forth important facts, were presented to either House after a Bill had undergone investigation by the joint Committee, the House surely could not ignore that petition. That very evening, in the case of the Dublin Improvement Bill, an instance had been afforded of the importance of a second hearing in another place, where the omissions, neglect, or misrepresentations of parties at the first hearing might be supplied or corrected. No doubt, investigation by the second tribunal was attended with expense, but that was a secondary consideration compared with security of individual interests. It was impossible that the noble Lord himself could more ardently desire improvement in legislation of this nature than he did. In fact, he had introduced a Bill relating to one branch of the subject, piers and harbours, and presided over the Committee that the Bill was referred to. He then learnt from most respectable witnesses, that the view he had taken was erroneous, and that the Parliamentary tribunal was by no means so unsatisfactory to the public as was supposed; those gentlemen declared their preference for the independent and impartial decisions of Committees, attended though these might sometimes be with expense and delay, to the arbitrary caprice of a public department, the officials of which were apt to run in a groove and to decide everything accordingly. He had come to the conclusion, as regarded a very large proportion of the business brought before Parliament, that it would be difficult to find any other tribunal which could deal with it as satisfactorily. There were, however, a vast number of applications which might be submitted to some tribunal out of doors; and he believed the extension of the system of provisional orders, being purely permissive, might be attended with useful results, preserving always the right of ultimate appeal to Parliament. The working of the Piers and Harbours Bill threw some light upon the matter. In the first year there were nine applications for provisional orders; seven were granted and passed by Parliament without opposition: last year there were fifteen applications; thirteen were granted, and there was one appeal to Parliament. That year there were twenty-seven applications, and in only three cases were objections taken and referred to a Committee. Without going into the question of the constitution of the Committee, his strong feeling was that these subjects must be kept within the walls of Parliament, as regarded final legislation, but that the provisional order system might be extended with a salutary effect.

MR. WHALLEY said, the real question at issue in most of these Private Bills, especially with regard to railways, was the question of competition between great companies; and, if that could be settled, he believed there would be no difficulty in acceding almost unanimously to the views which the noble Lord had so admirably expounded. The reason why the great companies were so unanimous in favour of the existing tribunal was because, owing to the expenditure and the great uncertainty of an appeal to Parliament, struggling enterprises were kept out of the field. The present system gave a virtual monopoly to the great companies, and seriously damaged the prospects of new local undertakings. Out of some £3,000,000 spent on new lines in the district with which he was connected, he believed he was not exaggerating when he said that an expenditure of £1,500,000 was due to the fact that all these schemes had to pass through Parliament. Money could rarely be raised for a local project in the district itself, and then it was necessary to apply for aid to contractors, engineers, and solicitors, who had no identity of interest with the district; who assumed the management of the line with reference only to their own interests, and who repaid themselves at the rate of 50 per cent for the risks they incurred. The great railway companies found out that they had no chance of getting their claims so well attended to as by the Committees of Parliament, and they acted on that knowledge. That was the only reason why that class of business was retained in the House, with such public results as the noble Lord had described, and with the private results upon the personal convenience of Members which must be familiar to all. It should be remembered that there would be as much finality in the decisions of any other tribunal to which those questions might be referred as there was in those of Select Committees. Those Committees did not really legislate—they simply reported their opinion to the House; and this would be the case with any other tribunal to which these matters were referred. The Report of the Committee of last Session noticed the various schemes which had been brought forward in reference to that class of business, and said that as it was not proposed by any one of the schemes to absolutely exclude parties from going before a Committee, in most cases they would avail themselves of the privilege, and thus the institution of a preliminary tribunal would only add to the length of the proceedings. That really was the ground for the House not parting with that class of business; and surely they should not be deterred from doing so, in consequence of the difficult questions involved, for the questions before Railway Committees were really much more simple than those brought before other Committees. In fact Railway Bills were much less complicated than Gas or Inclosure Bills. The increasing power of the great railway companies deserved the attention of that House. In 1853 competition was first allowed as a ground of objection to a new scheme; and then only at the discretion of the Committees. In 1863, when the question of competition was discussed by the Committee upon the various projects for the improvement of the present system, he carried a vote in the Committee that, so far as competition had been allowed as a ground of objection to new projects, it ought not to have been allowed, and that it should not be so in future; but that Resolution, though it formed the basis of about one half of the Report, was actually rescinded by the Committee—a step altogether without precedent, and due entirely to the overwhelming power and influence of the great companies in the Committees of the House. If they could exercise such influences in the Committees appointed to consider the subject of Private Bill legislation, much more might it be expected that such influence would be felt in the Private Bill Committees. The trade and general commerce of the country were involved in the question to an extent that was not exceeded by any single matter that engaged the attention of Parliament. The power of the great railway companies was also shown in regard to the Bill now before the House, and brought in by the President of the Board of Trade, for affording facilities for constructing railways. The Bill provided that where all the parties in a district having an interest in a new railway consented to its construction they could apply to the Board of Trade, and need not incur the expense of going before a Committee. The great companies, however, combined as one man, and insisted that they must have a voice in the new project. The Bill had therefore been altered to meet their views, and as it now stood it provided that if any railway or canal company intimated to the Board of Trade that they were not satisfied with the project, then the whole machinery of the Bill was set aside, and the parties applying for the Act were referred to a Committee upstairs, where they would have to cope with the inexhaustible resources of a great company. He trusted that, whatever the result of the present Motion might be, the noble Lord (Lord Robert Cecil) would not abandon the subject, but would continue to give it the patriotic, earnest, and enlightened attention he had already bestowed upon it. The noble Lord would find additional reason to be satisfied that he was devoting his influence and ability to a subject which would well repay his attention.

MR. DUTTON said, that although he did not go so far as the noble Lord, yet he could not think that Committees of the House were satisfactory tribunals to deal with these matters, except, indeed, so far as the honesty and integrity of purpose which they brought to bear upon the subject. It would be supposed that almost the first requisite of a tribunal to consider a railway Bill was great local knowledge, yet the Members of a Committee invariably came from different parts of the country, and thus could not have the requisite local knowledge. It had been said, in reference to the enormous sums spent before Committees, that the directors spent the shareholders' money recklessly; but on behalf of himself and his brother directors he must say that the expenditure was forced upon them, and chiefly by counsel overloading the inquiries with unnecessary evidence. Directors had a clear interest in saving money, because what they spent was partly their own. It had been said that the great companies were in favour of the present system; but he certainly had never heard his colleagues express such an opinion, or that they wanted to keep small companies out of the field. It was true that they were obliged to fight a great number of Bills, and often had eventually to buy the interest of the new companies, but that was not an economical mode of acquiring a line. Unfortunately the facilities for obtaining freeholds were now so great that, with the aid of a discount house and a contractor, any project, no matter how absurd, could be set afloat without difficulty. And then it was competent for a company to go before a Committee, and after fighting for a time, if their scheme was rejected, they might go before a new Committee the next year, with the same counsel and the same engineer, and then they would probably get a Bill without adducing any new evidence. That showed that the present system was not very perfect. He had listened with great pleasure to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, and agreed with him in thinking that there was a great want at present, because there was nothing to guide the Chairman of a Committee to a decision; there was no system of railway law to which he might look for direction in any difficulty. If the noble Lord should carry the question to a division he could not support him, but he thanked the noble Lord for the very able manner in which he had brought the subject before the House.

MR. PUGH said, he should have great pleasure in voting for the Resolution of the noble Lord. In a matter of this nature he would not have ventured to intrude his opinions on the House, but having read with much attention the Reports of the Select Committees of 1858 and 1863, and the best portion of the evidence, he collected that the highest authorities in that House and out of it were unanimous in expressing a strong sense of the evils of the present system. Considerable changes had been made in consequence of the Report of the first Committee, and the question was whether the time was not now come for going still further. It was stated by some of the authorities to whom he had alluded, that the evils of the present system were inseparable from the nature of the tribunals; that their decisions were fluctuating, uncertain, and frequently inconsistent, and did not command public confidence. It was also said that the Committees disliked the work allotted to them; and no one could blame them if they did. They knew that their constituents had no interest in that work; if they had, there was no labour they would not willingly undergo. As it was, they would prefer to devote their time to social and imperial questions, or to the study of international law, which now more than ever invited the attention of the country. They saw that the strength and talent of the House was eliminated before an appeal was made to their ranks. Those engaged in office were exempt, and likewise those engaged in the profession of the law. The orators of that House, to whose utterances they all lent an attentive ear, on whose effusions they ever dwelt with so much pleasure, were rarely, if ever, found to ply the labouring oar in the Committee-rooms upstairs. The duties of the Committees were of a more humble and unassuming nature—

"The applause of listening senates to command
Their lot forbade."

Thus, they found themselves committed to a contest beyond their strength, from which not much of credit or reputation was to be gained. It was the advice of a celebrated critic of antiquity to the poets never to take up a subject above their resources, and to consider well beforehand what burden their shoulders were able to bear—

"Sumite materiam vestris, qui scribitis, equam, Viribus; et versate diu, quid ferre recusent,
Quid valeant humeri."

And the same rule applied to orators, as an orator is said to be next akin to a poet. If he were asked what system was to be established in lieu of that now to be displaced, he would refer to the suggestion which had been made of a railway tribunal composed of men either in Parliament or out of it; and he would not attach too much weight to the objection against parting with any of their jurisdiction. In other matters, such as those submitted to the Inclosure Commissioners, they had parted with a good deal already, and he thought they might part with more of that description without the slightest diminution of their hereditary splendour. He hoped he had said nothing in any degree disparaging or undervaluing the labours of those who in the chief Committees set all this machinery in motion with so much ability and self-devotion. He had experienced from them nothing but consideration and kindness, and it was only because he had studied their opinions as embodied in the Reports with the deepest attention, and was influenced by their high authority, that he had ventured to say what he had, adopting their suggestions and treading in their steps, though, perhaps, going a little further than some of them. Seeing, then, that this confinement of Members in committee-rooms was unnecessary and useless, and might better be dispensed with; seeing that they had abolished the slave trade, and that Factory Acts had been passed with the approbation of every friend of humanity and his country, he would cordially vote for the Resolution, as containing within it the element and the germ of the emancipation of Members of Parliament.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he thought it would be useless to press his Motion in the then state of the House, and therefore he proposed to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

GOLD CURRENCY FOR INDIA.

RESOLUTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH: Sir, I rise to move,

"That the increasing trade and commerce of India, and the consequent increasing demand for a portable circulating medium, require that a gold currency should be established in that empire."

In India, and Eastern countries, silver is almost the sole instrument of exchange, even for the largest transactions. This fact has important bearings upon our trade, which, with the East, differs from that with other countries. In the case of India, our exports are insufficient to pay for our imports, and the consequence is that we have to pay the balance in specie. The extent of the exports of specie to India, from the commencement of the present century, will be shown by a Return moved for by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes); from which it will be seen that the balance of imports of specie, after deducting exports, into the provinces of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, from 1801 to 1851, a period of fifty-one years, was £110,662,000, and from 1852 to 1863, a period of twelve years, it was £123,691,000. The average import for fifty-one years appears to have been about £2,000,000 per annum; but for the last twelve years it has increased to £10,000,000 per annum. Last year (1863), however, the import amounted to £19,367,000. Now, in order to obtain specie for the payment of our Indian imports, it is necessary that we should export our manufactures to countries producing specie. There would be little inconvenience in this operation, but the specie required by India is silver, while the chief production of the precious metals is gold. A double operation, therefore, becomes necessary, first to exchange our manufactures for gold, and then to exchange the gold for silver. But besides the ordinary demand for specie, to pay the balance of our imports from the East, a variety of circumstances have concurred to create an extraordinary demand for silver within the last fifteen years. About £50,000,000 have been invested in Indian railways. There has been the expense of the mutiny in India, a Persian war, two Chinese wars, an increased importation of a variety of Indian products, and this year an extraordinary importation of cotton, amounting probably from £30,000,000 to £40,000,000. In addition to the demand for silver from the East, there has been also a drain of silver to supply those countries which have demonetized gold. The discovery of gold in California in 1848, and subsequently in Australia, produced a great panic in the commercial world. Bank directors and writers, who were supposed to know more about such questions than any one else, predicted a serious decline in the value of gold, and a rise in price of all commodities. In 1850, Holland took the alarm, and demonetized her gold currency. Belgium followed her example. Russia, Spain, and Portugal prohibited the export of silver. In 1852, the East India Company, which previously to that time received gold mohurs at the treasury for fifteen rupees each, declined to receive any payments except in silver. The effect of this demonetizing of gold was, on the one hand, to create a great demand for silver, to replace the gold circulation; and, on the other hand, to increase the alarm occasioned by the influx of gold, by swelling the volume of gold which was rolling in from California and Australia. The natural supply of silver is limited; the demand for it has been exceptionally large. M. Chevalier estimates that the export of silver to the Levant and the East in 1857 was £20,145,921, being more than double the yield of all the silver mines which supply the Western world. The exports to India alone, in the last twelve years, amounted to £98,476,766, besides probably £30,000,000 to £40,000,000 to China. The exports of silver are still increasing: last year, to India alone, the export was equal to the whole production of the silver mines. It is surprising, under all the circumstances, that the advance in the price of silver in this country has been so small, for while it has advanced in India 10 to 12 per cent, it has only advanced here 1 to 4 per cent, and less disturbance has been hitherto created by this extraordinary state of things than might have been expected. This inordinate Eastern demand for silver, could not have been met without occasioning a great advance in price, had it not fortunately happened that we have been able to obtain from France immense supplies of silver in exchange for gold. M. Chevalier says, the excess of exports over imports of silver from France, from 1852 to 1858, amounted to £45,080,000; and since then the exports have been in a like proportion. Until the gold discoveries, France had only a nominal circulation of gold, a small paper circulation, but an immense accumulation of silver coin. Her increasing trade and wealth had rendered her cumbrous silver currency inconvenient for large transactions, and she willingly availed herself of the profitable opportunity of an Eastern demand, to get rid of it in exchange for gold. By these means the demand for silver has been met with comparative ease; but this source of supply, however, cannot long continue unexhausted, and the produce of all the silver mines in the world being inadequate to meet the continued demand, some remedy is absolutely necessary to prevent the great commercial disturbance which must inevitably take place if a remedy be not applied. India has petitioned for a gold currency. A forcible memorial from the native Bombay Association to the Governor General sets forth—

"That from time immemorial, until some years ago, India possessed a gold currency. That the superior convenience of this circulating medium is well understood by the natives of this country. That the transport of a bulky and cumbrous silver currency entails constant and useless expense upon the country, and its consequent sluggish circulation is a serious impediment to trade. That India is not yet prepared for a paper currency, which does not circulate in the interior."

The great amount of the trade of India—the probable increase from the development of its resources by the opening out of roads, has made it necessary to adopt a more portable and convenient currency to facilitate its large transactions. In ten years the commerce of Bombay has increased 250 per cent. In 1863 the imports and exports amounted at Bombay to £59,000,000; Calcutta, £34,000,000; Madras, £13,000,000; total, £106,000,000. A Government paper currency has been introduced with a view to facilitate commerce; but its circulation is small, and confined to the Presidency towns, while the great want is in the country. It will take a long time to establish a paper currency in a country like India, if it be possible ever to circulate it beyond the large towns. I confess, however, I should regret to see a Government paper issue successful. No profit can compensate for the danger of its introduction in a country where ignorance and religious excitement are the characteristics of the people, and where whole districts are continually disturbed by fanatical appeals to their superstitions. The mutiny, which was the result of these causes, cost about £100,000,000 before it was subdued. How greatly would our embarrassment have been increased, if in addition to the anxieties of that period, a demand, influenced by a panic, had arisen for the immediate conversion of the Government notes into silver. The indiscretion of officials might produce such a result at any moment. Only the other day we saw how the religious bigotry of the people was excited from one end of India to the other, in consequence of an attempt being made at Calcutta, for sanitary purposes, to induce the people to bury their dead instead of partially burning and then throwing them into the river. The fanatical cry was immediately raised, that the Government wished to destroy their religion. Of course the only object was to preserve the public health, and the Government finding that its object was misconstrued, wisely withdrew the order; but the incident showed the fanatical temper of the people. It appears to me, then, that the safest and best course is to adopt a gold, instead of the attempt to introduce a paper currency. Why should not India, which is equally prepared for it, adopt a gold currency as well as France?

The world is not likely to be so inundated with gold, that its value will be more affected than that of silver. No doubt a general impression prevailed on the discovery of gold in California and Australia, that a serious decline in its value would take place, founded on the effects produced on prices by the influx of the precious metals on the discovery of America. This feeling was confirmed by the opinions of one of the most distinguished writers on these subjects in Europe, M. Chevalier, whose able work, On the Probable Fall in the Value of Gold, has been translated by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden). Baron Humboldt, however, appears to have taken the largest views of this question. He wisely observed, in reference to the difference between the influx of silver on the discovery of America, and the recent gold discoveries, that "a small quantity of rain would flood a rivulet, which would have scarcely a perceptible effect on a mighty river." And this seems to be a correct analogy between the barbarous state of Spain—with little trade or enterprise—the "rivulet," into which the vast supplies of silver were poured on the discovery of America,—and the present world, "the mighty river," teeming with activity, industry, and enterprise, the results of the growth of civilization and the advance of science and invention. The effects of the influx of gold have not so far realized the anticipations of those who believed that it would raise the price of commodities. Notwithstanding that, since 1848, a larger amount of gold has been produced than America produced from the first voyage of Columbus to the discovery of the mines of California in 1848, a period of 356 years, there is no evidence that the prices of commodities have been affected by this enormous influx of gold. Some commodities have no doubt risen, but the increase in price is in no way attributable to the influx of gold. The advance in cotton is the result, not of the influx of gold, but of the American war—of wine, the disease of the vine—of silk, the destruction of the silkworm, and so of other commodities. But let us take the price of wheat which Adam Smith adopts as the barometer of prices—

"The influx of silver on the discovery of America," he says, "caused a continuous decline in the price of wheat, until at the end of fifty years it required three ounces of silver to buy the same quantity of wheat which was previously bought with one ounce."

What have been the effects of the gold discoveries on the price of wheat in England? I find that the average price of wheat in 1847, the year before the discovery of gold in California, was 69s. 9d. per quarter; and now, in spite of the influx of gold since that period, the price instead of rising has fallen from 69s. to 39s. per quarter. An ounce of gold will, at the present moment, buy 75 per cent more wheat than in 1847, the year before the discovery of gold; in fact, the price of wheat, taking the quality into account, is as low now as at any period within the last half-century. Not only have writers been deceived as to the effects of the influx of gold on the price of commodities, but also in their expectations of vast accumulations of the precious metals in the national banks, such as they expected would render money almost valueless. There was, indeed, a great accumulation of bullion at the Bank of England at one period. In 1852, she held upwards of £20,000,000, the largest amount she ever held; but, within the last two months, her bullion was reduced below £13,000,000; and instead of money becoming almost valueless, she was obliged to raise the rate of discount to 9 per cent to keep her treasure from running away. In 1852, the bank of France held £24,000,000 of bullion; within the last two months, however, it was reduced below £10,000,000, and the rate of discount was raised to 8 per cent to prevent the efflux of her treasure. Sufficient allowance appears not to have been made by writers for the effect of the influx of gold in stimulating the production of commodities. If the production of commodities increase in proportion to the production of gold, their relative value will remain the same. Let us suppose all the commodities of the world, at the time of the gold discoveries, to be represented by the figures 100, and the precious metals then necessary to circulate the commodities to be also 100. An influx of the precious metals to double the amount, say to 200, without any increase in the quantity of commodities, would have the effect of doubling their price; but if commodities were also increased to 200, the relative value of gold and commodities would remain the same. There can be no doubt that the first effect of the gold discoveries was to create a disturbance in the relative value of gold and commodities. Half a million of men ceased to be producers, and were suddenly converted into wealthy consumers of commodities; prices rose; the abundance of money gave a stimulus to increased production, until an equilibrium was restored between gold and commodities. There is every reason to believe that the production of commodities has kept pace with that of the precious metals. We see an enormous increase of trade all the world over. Our own trade has increased nearly threefold since the gold discoveries, which could not have taken place except by the increase of commodities. It is not improbable the production of gold has reached its maximum; for while, on the one hand, fresh discoveries are constantly made; on the other hand, the produce of California and Australia is reported to have fallen off. By a Return, moved for by the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird), it appears that the exports from Victoria for the last five years show a constant decline, namely:—

1858 ...	2,555,263	£10,220,000
1859 ...	2,280,525
1860 ...	2,128,466
1861 ...	1,978,864
1862 ...	1,662,448	£6,642,624

As the alluvial deposits become exhausted, recourse must be had to the working of the quartz rocks; gold mining then becomes a manufacture, and comes into competition with other industries, and will not be continued unless it be equally profitable. Of the mines which may be abandoned, because at present unprofitable, many may remain as a reserve for future generations, when population becomes more dense, labour cheaper, and capital more abundant; in the same way that mines in this country, which were abandoned by the Romans as unprofitable, are now being scientifically worked, and are yielding large profits. Whatever falling off, however, there may be in the production of gold, we have at present experienced no diminution of the supply. The war in America having led to an irredeemable circulation of paper, a large amount of the gold previously circulating in that country has been exported, and this is sufficient to account for any diminution in the production of gold not being yet felt in Europe. The results of the influx of the precious metals, consequent upon the discoveries in California and Australia, have not then realized the expectations of those supposed to be best informed on these questions. There have been no sufficient grounds for the alarm which led to the demonization of gold. It is shown that the price of gold, as compared with commodities, has not declined, and that even the rise in the price of silver has not been occasioned by the influx of gold, but by the enormous exceptional demand for it from the East. These facts are important in considering the policy of adopting such a gold currency in India as will circulate from hand to hand, which it cannot be said that country has yet enjoyed; for although previously to 1852 the gold mohur was received at the Treasury at the fixed value of fifteen rupees (or fifteen times its weight in silver), being intrinsically worth more than fifteen rupees in silver, none were paid in, so that the law was in effect a dead letter. In 1852, in consequence of the apprehension of a great decline in the value of gold from the discoveries of California and Australia, gold mohurs began to be paid into the Treasury at fifteen rupees: the Directors of the East India Company, however, then prohibited the receipt of gold at the Treasury, and silver became the sole legal tender. Had this prohibition not taken place, it is not improbable that India, like France, would by this time have had, in addition to its silver, a large gold circulation. Now, assuming that a gold coinage for India has become a necessity, is it desirable to coin mohurs, to circulate English sovereigns, or to have an entirely new coinage? It has been suggested that sovereigns should be allowed to circulate in India; if, however, they are to circulate at the market price of silver, it will be equivalent to saying they shall not circulate at all, since all experience teaches us, that gold coins will not be voluntarily accepted by the public, if they be only allowed to circulate at a fluctuating value. In such cases they only circulate with money changers. Another suggestion is, that sovereigns shall be received at the Treasury for the value of ten rupees. Now, as the intrinsic value of a sovereign is ten and a half rupees, a plan like this would be as great a joke as the Queen issuing a proclamation that spade-ace guineas would be received at the English Treasury for twenty shillings. No doubt a continuous enormous demand for silver, and a short supply, may so raise its price in India, that a sovereign may temporarily pass for only twenty shillings; but what is wanted is, a permanent gold currency, a gold coin which will circulate from hand to hand, and be received for taxes and all other payments as in England and France. No such coin will thus circulate, unless it represent a definite and fixed value, the Queen's stamp being the certificate that it contains a fixed quantity of pure gold. Hitherto the proportion between gold and silver coins has been fixed at one to fifteen, but as gold is intrinsically more valuable than fifteen times its weight in silver, gold coins bear a premium, and only circulate with money changers. To provide a coin which shall circulate from hand to hand, a change in the relative proportions of gold and silver will be necessary. The most convenient coins for India would probably be gold pieces of five and ten rupees each. But if these gold coins were issued in unlimited quantity, there would arise the difficulty of a double standard. Without advocating a double standard, it is a fact worthy of note, that a double standard has existed in France for sixty years, and it has not been shown that any inconvenience has arisen from it. We all know that the argument against a double standard is, that as the price of gold and silver constantly fluctuates, debtors having the option to pay in either, would always pay their debts in the cheaper metal. If it be advisable to adopt a gold currency in India, it is worthy consideration whether it be possible to obviate this by a gold coinage made subsidiary to silver, taking the standard for instance of France, of a gold piece equal in value to fifteen and a half times its weight of silver, and so to limit the issue as always to preserve its value. I am aware that this is a novel suggestion, but it is acknowledged that even an irredeemable paper currency, if limited in quantity, will maintain an equal value to that which it represents; and why should this not hold good in a gold circulation, issued as subsidiary to silver? I remember having a conversation with the late M. Horace Say in 1851, on the subject of paper issues, arising out of the suspension of specie payments by the Bank of France at the Revolution of 1848. At that time there was a run upon the Bank for the purpose of hoarding, which would soon have exhausted its treasure: the Bank, therefore, with the concurrence of the Government, suspended cash payments, and its notes became inconvertible. The first effect of this suspension of payments was, that its notes fell to a discount of 1 to 2 per cent, but this continued only for two or three days, for such was the skill exhibited in the management of the Bank in limiting its issues, that the notes were ever afterwards of equal value, and sometimes even more valuable than specie. In Germany, some twenty years ago, the Prussian Government issued a limited quantity of notes, which were receivable for taxes, but which were found so much more convenient for carrying about than rix-thalers, that they bore a small premium, which I constantly preferred to give rather than be encumbered with silver. If such be the effect produced by the limitation of a paper circulation, why should not the limitation of a gold circulation be equally effective in preserving its value? It may be objected that the coins so issued would be melted, but having always a higher value than gold, because of their value as money, it would not be the interest of any one to melt coin in preference to cheaper gold. The existing large demand for silver from the East is exceptional, but may yet last for several years. I have reason to believe the Secretary of State for India is alive to the importance of the question; but let me urge upon the right hon. Gentleman, that prompt measures be taken by the Government to meet evils which, if neglected, may by and bye have a serious effect on the financial interests both of England and India.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the increasing trade and commerce of India, and the consequent increasing demand for a portable circulating medium, requires that a Gold Currency should be established in that Empire,"

COLONEL SYKES said, he considered the subject one of very considerable importance and interest both to England and India; for it involved this question—how England was to pay for the annual debt she incurred to India for the sugar, cotton, tea, coffee, indigo, and other commodities she received from that country? The imports received from India had been from year to year increasing from £10,672,862 in 1854, to £34,133,551 in 1861, and to £48,434,517 in 1863, while the exports from England had been only increasing from £9,620,710 in 1854, to £15,346,426 in 1862, consequently the balance of debt was increasing in the same proportion. To meet that balance of debt England sent silver to India. Since 1801, by a Return on the table of the House, it appeared that the silver bullion sent to India amounted to £234,000,000, including small quantities of gold. The question arose whether, owing to the annually increasing demand of silver bullion for India, the production of silver from the mines went on with a proportionate increase to the demand. Recently the prospect had become so unsatisfactory, that the Chamber of Commerce at Bombay had addressed a memorial to the Governor General, Sir John Lawrence, on the subject. That memorial stated that within the last ten years the trade to Bombay had been troubled, and last year the aggregate export and import of the three Presidencies amounted to £106,000,000. The total product of silver from the mines was only £10,000,000 per annum, while India took from us on an average silver to the amount of £11,500,000 per annum. Last year she took £14,500,000 of silver. The result was an increase in the price of silver. England must therefore either buy less of the products of India or pay in some other way than silver. There could be no doubt that the Natives of India would receive gold money. His right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Wood) possessed in the museum that belonged to the East India Company a collection of all the coins of India—the finest in Europe. It comprised specimens of coins from the time of Alexander's successors in Bactrea and the Punjab down to the present day. During a period of 2,100 years there is proof that gold monies had been in circulation among the people of India. There was no doubt, therefore, about the fact that his right hon. Friend had nothing to do but try to induce the people of India to accept his gold in the same form in which they had accepted it in former times. When he himself went to India he received his pay in gold rupees of about the size of shillings. The Madras army was then paid in gold currency called Pagodas or Hoons. There could be no question, therefore, about the readiness of the people to accept a gold currency if given them under conditions to which he would presently refer. So lately as the time of Moolraj, gold rupees were coined at Mool-

tan, and he (Colonel Sykes) possessed a specimen. But there was evidence that the people of India were quite satisfied to receive the gold coins of Europe, provided they were pure. On the Malabar Coast and in the Province of Canara and in the Nielgherries gold coins of the Roman Emperors were frequently turned up. In 1851 at a village ten miles eastward from Cananore, on the slope of a hill, while persons were searching for gold dust, hundreds, indeed thousands, of Roman gold coins were found, ranging from the reign of Augustus Cæsar down to that of Antoninus Pius. General Cullen, the Resident in Travancore, was good enough at his (Colonel Sykes) request, to present specimens to the museum of the India Company, where they now are. Why had these coins been sent there? The Romans, when they wanted to get the products of the Malabar coast, had nothing but gold to pay for them, for they had no acceptable manufactures to offer in exchange. So, again, the Venetians, when they traded with India, took with them the sequin—a pure gold coin, with the figure of the Virgin Mary upon it; and that coin, under the name of the Pootlee or figured coin, still existed in India, and was treated entirely as a commodity at its market value. He next came to the conditions on which a coinage could be circulated among the people of India. The gold coins to which he had referred were all of pure gold. There never had been a standard of value in India; and when we talked of such a standard among ourselves we used a conventional term which was often a mockery. Why, formerly, when our gold coin was exported to Spain in the Peninsular War to pay our army, people in England had to give 28s. for a gold guinea if they wanted one! There could be no such thing as a permanent standard of value. Supply and demand regulate the exchangeable value of all commodities, and gold and silver are only commodities. The gold mohur was nominally worth fifteen rupees; and if the Government agreed to receive their taxes in gold mohurs they might get only fourteen rupees for each of them in the market; or, on the other hand, if mohurs were scarce, the Government might make a profit on them. The Government took its land tax in rupees, irrespectively of whether sixty pice or less could be got for each rupee. That would entirely depend on the market value of copper. What he wished to impress on the Secretary of State for India was that if he would introduce a gold coin of five or ten rupees, and have it of pure gold, of a certain weight, the people would take it. But then, again, the Government must take it at its market value, not at a conventional price. At Madras since the years 1847-8 they had never coined a gold coin at the Mint; at Bombay since 1836 they had never coined a gold coin; in Bengal there had been very trifling additions made to the gold monies. It was objected to pure gold coin that it wore away rapidly. He had in his hand a note from a gentleman who had charge of the whole of the coins in the British Museum, and who was a great numismatist. The writer had thoroughly studied this subject, and he said—

"I have been thinking over the question of a gold currency for India, and have looked at the various regulations as given in Prinsep's Tables, vol. ii. p. 69, &c., and also at the earliest gold coins we have here, being those of Sardes and probably of Croesus, or some other Lydian king. I cannot from the former come to his conclusion, that because the introduction of a gold currency in India has not hitherto met with the success it seems to deserve, or because some mistakes appear to have been made in the manner of its introduction, that, therefore, such a step is impracticable; and from the latter, I should be inclined to argue strongly in favour of the durability of gold, if the coins should be struck thick, and considerably rounded, like the ancient Sardinian money, and not flat, like the present sovereign. The question of wear and tear is rather one for the chymist; but certainly these Sardinian coins have lasted wonderfully since the sixth century B.C., and it is obvious that a surface considerably rounded is naturally much less liable to abrasion than our flat modern money. These Sardinian coins are very nearly pure gold—that is, there is no intentional alloy—and I believe that if not required to be flat, like the sovereign, the proportion of alloy now used would not be required. It has been argued that if you introduced a pure gold currency into India the Natives would melt the coins down to make ornaments, and that you must insert a larger alloy than we do here, on the same principle that you have added a considerable quantity of alloy to your rupees to render them less fit for subsequent native adaptation. I confess I should be inclined to leave a question of this sort to time and to the gradual operation of the good sense of the people."

The writer continues—

"I imagine that any gold coinage struck for general acceptance in India must be quite pure, or at least as free from alloy as was the Greek gold, and that you could not expect the Natives to accept a gold coinage which was alloyed at all in the manner or degree that your present rupees are."

That was the opinion of a gentleman whose extensive knowledge and experience rendered his authority well worthy the consideration of his right hon. Friend. He would tell his right hon. Friend that his sovereign would never circulate and be accepted as a currency in India in its alloyed state. If the Government would introduce a pure gold coin of ten rupees, which would be received back at its market price by the Treasury, he would succeed, but not otherwise.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the question which his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport had brought before the House was very interesting and important, and, from the attention which he had himself always paid to subjects of this nature, he felt a peculiar interest in it. When they came to discuss it in detail it would be found to be, perhaps, suited to the consideration rather of a scientific meeting than of the House of Commons. There were, however, some general views on the subject which might be stated. He could not agree with his hon. Friend in his criticism on the paper currency of India. Two or three years ago the Government undertook to establish a Government paper circulation in India, in lieu of the partial circulation of private banks, which existed to the amount of about £3,000,000. Although the arrangements made in India for that purpose were so faulty that delay had occurred in extending the operation of the system, yet the present issue of paper amounted to about £5,000,000 in the Presidency towns. It was also not a little remarkable, that when there was great pressure at Bombay on account of the scarcity of coin, people were bringing in rupees in order to obtain paper in exchange. Measures had been taken to develop the system, and to establish centres of issue in the great centres of commerce in India, where a paper circulation would furnish a useful, safe, and convenient mode of conducting business. It was well known that bills of exchange were transmitted to a large extent from one part of India to another, and the Hindoos were remarkably clever in these commercial transactions; therefore, he saw no reason why they should not avail themselves in a considerable degree of the facilities afforded by a paper circulation. He agreed with his hon. Friend, that the form of currency which existed in this country was the best. A gold standard coin of a certain fineness and weight, with subsidiary silver and copper coins, and a paper circulation of a limited amount on securities, and the remainder based on gold or silver in the banks. Whatever might be our own opinions, however, as to the best form of a currency, there could be no doubt that it was a very difficult thing to attempt a change in that respect and to bring such a system into effect in a land where transactions were small, where there was little demand for gold, more for silver, and much more still for copper. Except under the pressure of a few months of last autumn, they had always been able to meet the demand for silver circulation, but they had been hardly able to meet the demand for copper. Looking to the greater value of gold coins, therefore, he had no doubt that gold would be circulated to some, but not to a very large extent. His hon. Friend had fallen into one or two inaccuracies, having probably been misled by the petition on the subject from Bombay. In times past silver was the only standard and the only legal tender in India, with the exception of a single gold coin in Bengal. When the currency was reformed some years ago a gold rupee, or, as it was called, mohur, was coined, which was equal to fifteen silver rupees. The mohur was not a legal tender, but it was received by the Government treasuries as the equivalent to fifteen silver rupees. It had been stated that this change was a dead letter, and that was in the main true. The people of India were not very partial to the gold mohur; they preferred pure gold, and no great amount of the coinage of gold was circulated in the country. That was the state of affairs up to 1853. At that time, and indeed until within the last year or two, there was an impression among philosophers and well informed persons that the discoveries of gold in California and Australia would tend to depreciate very considerably the value of that metal. The people of India were disposed to share this view, and began paying in the gold mohurs to the Treasury. The Government took alarm, and declined any longer to receive the gold coins at the treasury. His own opinion was that the alarm was unnecessary, for the ultimate loss to which the Indian Government could have been subjected would have been comparatively trifling. The amount of gold in circulation was not sufficiently large to affect the state of matters in the same way as it did in France when a change took place in its value. His hon. Friend said that the rule for receiving gold at the public treasuries had been a dead letter, and then added, that but for the prohibition of Lord Dalhousie, the same effect would have been produced in India as had been produced in France of changing the currency from silver to gold. Surely it must be obvious that no such effect could have been produced by repealing a regulation which was a dead letter. The change in France arose without any alteration of the law from a change in the relative value of gold and silver. Both were legal tenders in France, a debt might equally be discharged by coins containing an ounce of gold, or by coins containing  $15\frac{1}{2}$  oz. of silver. Before the recent discoveries of gold, an oz. of gold was worth nearly  $15\frac{3}{4}$  oz. of silver, and of course no man gave what was worth nearly  $15\frac{3}{4}$  oz. when  $15\frac{1}{2}$  oz. would answer his purpose. After the discoveries of gold, an oz. of gold was worth only about  $15\frac{1}{2}$  oz. of silver, and, of course, everybody was glad to pay in gold what was worth only  $15\frac{1}{2}$  oz. of silver, when if he paid in silver, he must have given  $15\frac{3}{4}$  oz. Under the system of a double standard, and with the change of relative value of the two metals, this change took place in France; but the value of gold has never fallen so low as to reach its relative legal value to silver in India. The production of gold had now fallen off, and large discoveries of silver, and greater cheapness of producing it from the discoveries of new mines of quicksilver are anticipated; and if it should so happen that the relative value of gold and silver was restored to its former proportion all that had taken place in France would be reversed, and the currency of silver be again restored. It was a good instance of the evils of a double standard.

The next question was, whether a gold standard should be substituted for a silver standard in India. There would be many advantages in having a gold standard; and the sovereign circulating there as well as in this country and Australia, but he was not prepared at present to undertake the responsibility which would be involved in substituting a gold for the present silver circulation in India, for such a change could not be carried into effect without a great disturbance of trade. Until the people were more accustomed to gold it would be a serious measure, and might be dangerous to remodel the whole circulation of India in the manner proposed; for a belief might be induced among the Natives that in arbitrarily altering the standard from silver to gold, the Government meant to take some advantage of them, and that their whole property would be put in jeopardy. He was not prepared to incur this risk, and then came the question, what steps could be taken to produce the desired effect of gradually introducing gold into circulation in India, and accustoming the people to its use. All through India the general request was, that the English sovereign should be received in the Government Treasuries as equivalent to 10 rupees. He admitted that the establishment of the sovereign in England, Australia, and India would be a great convenience in commercial transactions, but the difficulty was how to do it. In the public accounts of India the rupee was taken, no doubt, as the tenth part of a sovereign, because for certain purposes it was convenient to reckon the rupee as equivalent to 2s.; but, in point of fact, that was not its real value, for a sovereign was worth more in the market than 10 rupees. The standard in India being silver the value of the sovereign there should be measured by silver, but he regretted to say that he had not been able to ascertain with any degree of accuracy what the value of gold in the Indian market was, although it ought to be as readily obtainable as the market value of silver in this country. The extent to which sovereigns could be substituted for silver coins in India, so as to obviate the necessity now imposed upon mercantile men of carrying great quantities of silver about with them, would depend upon the amount of sacrifice involved in receiving a sovereign as equivalent to 10 rupees. He found that during the last two years the sovereign had varied in value at Calcutta from 10 rupees and 1 anna, that is, about  $1\frac{1}{4}$ d. to 10 rupees, and 4 annas, and a-half, that is, about  $6\frac{1}{4}$ d. If that might be accepted as a real indication of the value of the sovereign, the sacrifice would not be great, and therefore he was disposed to try the experiment of receiving a sovereign in the Government Treasuries as equal to 10 rupees. No doubt this would give it a certain amount of circulation, because any person taking a sovereign up country, if he could not sell it in the market for what it was worth, would, at all events, be able to dispose of it by paying it into a Government Treasury. Still he did not pretend to say that this concession would have any great effect, because the intrinsic value of a sovereign was more than 10 rupees; but, as it would meet the wishes of the people, and would go some way towards introducing gold, he had no objection to such a measure. At the same time, he did not wish to be understood as giving any positive assurance on the subject, for he must first ascertain the opinion of the Indian Government itself. The memorial to which the hon. Member for Stockport had referred was at present under the consideration of the Indian Government, who would doubtless announce what they thought practicable and prudent after receiving reports from different parts of India, and taking the opinion of the intelligent merchants; and meanwhile he did not think it would be right to give any positive directions from here. In point of fact, he did not wish at this moment to express any decided opinion as to what should be done, and he believed no good could be derived from attempting to come to a decision here until the views of the Indian Government were ascertained. He hoped, under these circumstances, that the hon. Member for Stockport would not press his Motion to a division.

MR. WATKIN said, that the right hon. Baronet had not attempted to answer the question of his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport, but perhaps he had misunderstood the effect of the Motion. He had argued as if the proposal was to substitute a gold for the existing silver circulation in India. What the Motion before the House really meant was that, inasmuch as the silver circulation was deficient, it should be augmented by the establishment of a gold circulation, in order that the increasing requirements of trade and commerce might be fairly met. But the right hon. Baronet had assumed that there was no gold coin but the British sovereign to supplement the Indian coinage. He (Mr. Watkin) thought that the use of the gold did not depend so much on the relative values of gold and silver as on the size of the coin which would be introduced. Hon. Members who travelled in France knew the great convenience afforded by the introduction of a little gold coin, worth five francs, instead of the old silver five-franc pieces. If the right hon. Baronet would address himself to the question, whether he could not coin a gold piece representing a two-shilling piece, he might, without any destruction to trade, bring in a useful coin into the British dominions in India.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the hon. Member, in advocating the proposal that silver coinage should be supplemented by a gold one, was really aiming at establishing a double standard. No doubt it would be desirable to supplement the gold coinage by a silver one, but it would be difficult to do that without creating a double standard. He understood that the Natives of India would not take a sovereign because it contained alloy, and if that were so, they would not be likely to take a gold token, which the gold rupee would be in the absence of a double standard, unless it were of pure gold. Perhaps the only possible mode of doing it would be by the introduction of the sovereign in some such manner as that suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, and by its superior portability and other advantages it might possibly be brought into use.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

EDUCATION—(SCOTLAND).

QUESTION.

MR. DUNLOP said, that in putting the Question of which he had given Notice relative to Education in Scotland, he wished to give his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Committee of Council an opportunity of explaining to the House and the country the course which it was the intention of the Government to adopt with reference to a matter which had created the greatest interest in Scotland—the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject of education in that country. A large body of the Members for Scotland had recently waited on the Lord President of Council, and strongly impressed upon him the anxious desire of the people of Scotland that Her Majesty's Government should issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the state of education in Scotland, not simply in reference to the narrow question of the introduction into Scotland of the Revised Code, but to the subject of education at large, with a view of establishing a basis for restoring and extending the old national system of education in Scotland, and rendering it more efficient. They, at the same time, thought that if any such inquiry should be determined upon, it would only be just and right that the operation of the Revised Code should in the meantime be suspended in Scotland. That Code was adopted after an inquiry relating to England, without any reference whatever to Scotland; and, in many respects, it was not in accordance with the habits of the people. From the reception given to the deputation by the Lord President, they had strong reason to hope that the Government would give a favourable consideration to their application; and he now requested his right hon.

Mr. Goschen

Friend to inform the House of the conclusion at which the Government have arrived in the matter. If it be, as he had some reason to expect it would be, in favour of granting their application, he could assure him, on the part of all the gentlemen who waited upon the Lord President on that occasion, that such an announcement would be received with great satisfaction.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, in answer to the questions which have been put by my hon. Friend, I beg to inform him that Her Majesty's Government have decided upon issuing a Commission, one of the principal objects of which is, as my hon. Friend has stated, to consider whether it is not possible to erect a national system on the foundation of the old parochial system in Scotland, as amended by the Schoolmasters Act of 1861. In considering the question, whether the Revised Code should be applied to Scotland in the interim until the Commissioners had presented their Report, there certainly did seem to be valid objections to such a course. The Revised Code came into operation on the 31st of March in the present year, and up to this time it has been applied to very few schools. It could hardly be justifiable to insist upon the immediate application of that Code to Scotland, seeing that the inquiries of the Commissioners may result in the recommendation of a system of national education in Scotland for the working classes, which will differ not only from the Revised Code, but also from the system which was in operation before the Revised Code was adopted. For these reasons, Her Majesty's Government have consented to suspend the operation of the Revised Code until the Report of the Commissioners shall have been presented, on the understanding, however, that that Report shall be made within twelve months of the issue of the Commission. This suspension, however, will have reference only to the elementary schools, and not to the normal schools. With respect to the normal schools, to which the Minute of March last applies, there does not appear to be any reason why the same course should not be adopted with regard to them which is adopted with regard to the same class of schools in England.

MR. BUCHANAN, MR. LESLIE, and other Scotch Members said, that the announcement of the right hon. Gentleman would be received with great satisfaction in Scotland.

NAVY—SCHOOL OF NAVAL ARCHITECTURE.—PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he rose to move for copies of a communication made to the Admiralty by Sir W. Snow Harris on the organization of the proposed School of Naval Architecture. It was most important that the House should have every possible information on that subject. He objected to the Vote for the institution on the ground of its being placed at Kensington, and one of the principal reasons given for having it there was, that it afforded an opportunity of having a staff of professors; but it appeared that there was no such staff, and to provide them would render a large outlay necessary. Then they were told that there were suitable apartments available at Kensington, whereas the school was held in a ramshackle kind of shed. It was impossible to tell what the expense of this institution might be, and he wished to know whether the scheme for the institution had been submitted to the Treasury, and if it had investigated whether the system was likely to answer, and its probable cost?

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "there be laid before this House, Copy of a Communication made to the Admiralty by Sir W. Snow Harris on the organization of the proposed School of Naval Architecture,"—(Mr. Augustus Smith.)

—instead thereof.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he was sorry his hon. Friend so pertinaciously opposed the school of naval architecture, which had been generally called for by the public. The Government itself shared in that opinion, and the school in question had been projected by the Government in deference to the policy of the country, and because they themselves thought it would be productive of considerable advantage. A site for the school had been selected at South Kensington simply because it presented itself at the time, and because the Admiralty were of opinion that it would be advisable on the score of economy to establish it there; but he did not mean to say that it should, therefore, be permanently fixed in that quarter. A very eligible site might possibly hereafter be found at Greenwich, but he merely mentioned that to show that the Admiralty had arrived at no positive conclusion as to where the institution should at a future time be located. He objected to the Motion of his hon. Friend because—while admitting freely the high scientific qualifications of Sir W. Snow Harris—he thought it would be introducing a novel system to print at the public expense a document containing simply the views of a private individual, however eminent, who was not a recognized authority on the subject treated of. If Sir W. Snow Harris's pamphlet were published, there was no reason why the opinions of the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdon, who had taken great pains to make himself acquainted with the subject of naval construction, and of other distinguished persons should not be published also.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would take that occasion to call attention to the unsatisfactory mode in which the business of the House was being conducted, as if the voting away of the public money was only a matter of secondary importance. Night after night hon. Members had to remain until between eleven and twelve o'clock before the Government got into Committee of Supply, and then millions of money were voted away ultimately at hours when many Members had been obliged to leave the House. There were no less than twenty-two Motions on the paper to-night, on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he regretted as much as his hon. Friend could do that such impediments should be cast in the way of the discussion of the Estimates, but the Government had no power to prevent it. It was quite natural that hon. Members should desire to call the attention of the House to subjects in which they felt an interest; but, considering the advanced period of the Session, and the great number of votes which remained to be taken, he trusted that they would exercise a little more forbearance as to putting down Motions on going into Supply.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he would suggest that Friday night should be given up to general discussions, and that for the remainder of the Session the House should go into Committee of Supply on Mondays and Thursdays without the interposition of any other questions.

SUPPLY.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(1.) QUEEN'S MESSAGE [6th June] read ; £20,000, Sir Rowland Hill, K.C.B.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON : Sir, I trust that the Committee will be disposed to concur, without any objection, in the recommendation which Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to make. Sir Rowland Hill is a man of great genius, of great sagacity, of great perseverance and industry, and he has rendered important services to this country, and I may say to other countries also. He formed the opinion, in which I concur, that the Post Office was more properly a department for the performance of service than for the mere collection of revenue; and with a boldness which staggered a great number of persons who had not looked at the matter from the same point of view, he recommended a very large reduction in the rate of postage, with the confidence that it would in the end bring up the revenue to the same amount to which it had previously stood, and would in the meantime confer great benefit upon the community. Grave doubts were entertained, many people thought that he was too sanguine in his calculations, and that, although the number of letters might increase, the increase would not be sufficient to make the revenue recover the great shock which the introduction of the penny postage would inflict upon it. Those anticipations have been falsified, and the calculations of Sir Rowland Hill have turned out to be correct. Sir Rowland Hill had for nearly a quarter of a century performed, with some slight interval, the arduous duties which have devolved upon him in connection with the scheme, and he is now at a time of life when his health must have suffered from the great labour which attaches to his office. The Treasury have on that ground given him permission to retire, and have done that which I am sure this House will not think too much—they have given him his full salary for life. He is now, I believe, in the seventieth year of his age, and his health has been shattered by the labours which he has had to perform. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty thought that this House would be of opinion that the great services which he has performed would recommend him for a grant which should enable him to make those arrangements for his family which the short period during which he may probably enjoy his pension would not otherwise permit him to make. His labours have produced more beneficial results than may strike persons at first sight. It is quite clear that the facilities which the penny postage has given to all the transactions of commerce and to all communications connected with business must have been infinitely advantageous to the industry, and, by that means, to the revenue—not to the revenue of the Post Office, but to that revenue which arises out of the general prosperity of the country. In that view Sir Rowland Hill has performed great services to the country; but there is another view in which he has produced still more startling results—namely, in the amount of happiness and comfort which his plan has conferred upon millions of the poorer classes of the community. When the rate of postage was as high as it was before that plan was introduced, communication between the members of a poor family who were scattered about the country was difficult and expensive. How could a poor labouring man pay 1s. or 6d. for a letter? Communications between the members of such families was more difficult than the communication between England and Australia is now. The cultivation of the affections, which frequent intercommunication assists, raises men in their own estimation and in the standing which they occupy in society. It improves their morals, and develops all those qualities which tend to make useful members of the community. Therefore, I say that Sir Rowland Hill, independently of the benefits which his plan has conferred upon the general interests and prosperity of the country, has the merit of having conferred a great benefit upon the labouring and poorer classes of the people, which would of itself entitle him to any mark of approbation and reward which the House may be disposed to confer upon him. In the year 1838, before the penny postage was introduced, the number of letters transmitted through the Post Office was 76,000,000; in 1863, the number was 642,000,000. That is a measure of the extent to which that plan has assisted the industry and contributed to the comfort and happiness of the community. There are many matters connected with the plan which are independent of the mere reduction of the amount paid for the postage of letters. Among others, there is the facility which his arrangements have given for the transmission of money in small sums from one part of the country to another. The amount of the Money Orders taken out in 1838 was £313,000; in 1863 it was £16,494,000. What an immense advantage to the community at large must have resulted from the facility for the safe transmission of so large an amount of small sums which it would otherwise have been very difficult and in some cases expensive to transmit! Then, there is the book post. It is greatly conducive to the interests of literature, and the arrangements have been most extensively taken advantage of. The gross revenue of the Post Office has increased very considerably, but of course the increase of facilities has led to the multiplication of establishments and officers, and has therefore largely increased the outgoings. In 1838 the gross receipts were £2,346,000; in 1863 they were £3,870,000; showing that Sir Rowland Hill was perfectly right in anticipating that at no distant period the receipts of the Post Office would recover from the diminution which the first introduction of his plan naturally produced. In point of fact, everybody is so well acquainted with the merits of Sir Rowland Hill's plan and the good effects which it has produced, that I shall content myself, without further observations, with moving the Resolution of which I have given notice. The noble Viscount concluded by moving that a sum not exceeding £20,000 should be granted to Her Majesty as a provision for Sir Rowland Hill.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that no one more highly estimated the great services of Sir Rowland Hill than he did; but it ought to be remembered that he was not the only person who was concerned in carrying out the change in the postal system. The late Mr. Wallace, almost night after night, urged the subject upon the attention of that House, and did more to introduce the plan to the country than Sir Rowland Hill. No doubt great services ought to be rewarded; but years ago there had been a large subscription raised for Sir Rowland Hill, and he thought that and the pension were a sufficient recompense for his services, especially as the Post Office had yielded a very large revenue, whereas at present he did not think it paid its expenses.

MR. J. C. EWART, on behalf of the large mercantile community of Liverpool, said, that he desired to express his satisfaction at the proposal of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. His constituents would have wished the Government to go even further, for at a public meeting at Liverpool, at which the mayor presided, the opinion was expressed that the proposed grant of £20,000 was inadequate.

MR. J. A. TURNER said, that the people of Manchester felt the greatest respect for Sir Rowland Hill, and believed that he had conferred a benefit not only on them, but on the world. He was surprised at the objections raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Lambeth. He was glad that the noble Lord the Prime Minister had come forward with a more liberal proposition than had originally been made by the Government. He was sure that if he had gone round the Exchange of Manchester he could have raised more for a tribute to Sir Rowland Hill's family than the pension originally proposed by the Government.

MR. BAINES said that, representing a large constituency, he fully believed that the whole mercantile interests of the country would most heartily concur in the proposition of the noble Viscount in proposing a liberal grant. The hon. Member for Lambeth had stated that Mr. Wallace had proposed a similar scheme many years before it was propounded by Sir Rowland Hill. [MR. W. WILLIAMS: Not before.] The pamphlet of Sir Rowland Hill was one of the most consummate pieces of inductive reasoning he ever read, and it produced an effect which it was impossible for the Government of the day to resist. The measure was an exceedingly bold one. It proposed to reduce the postage from a shilling, and in some cases a larger amount, to a penny. That was thought most extravagant; yet it was proved by Sir Rowland Hill that the public revenue would be recouped by the increase of the correspondence that would ensue. And that had been done by the most extraordinary success that attended the measure. He believed the advantages of the scheme were altogether inestimable; and it extended not to England alone, but to the whole civilized world. Therefore, with the greatest pleasure, he supported the Motion for conferring that handsome grant on the family of a distinguished man.

MR. CRAWFORD said, it was hardly necessary that further testimony should be given of the estimation in which Sir Rowland Hill's services were held; but representatives of large commercial communities having expressed their opinions, he thought it was hardly proper that the City of London should be silent. He, therefore, on the part of the City of London, begged to express his hearty concurrence in all that had been said in favour of the vote. He hoped that the principle which Sir Rowland Hill applied to internal postage would be extended to commerce with the world, and that, before long, an ocean penny postage would be established.

MR MALINS said that, as the representative of a small constituency, he wished to express his hearty concurrence in all that had fallen from the other side of the House with regard to the vote. The hon. Member for Lambeth had expressed an opinion that Sir Rowland Hill had been amply remunerated by his salary during past years and its continuance in the shape of a retiring allowance during his life and the life of Lady Hill; but by usage Sir Rowland Hill would have been entitled to two-thirds of his salary as a retiring allowance for his services if they had been of an ordinary character. Allusion had also been made by the hon. Member to the public subscription for Sir Rowland Hill. In a great commercial country a gentleman often realized an enormous fortune for some happy thought and invention. Why, then, should not Sir Rowland Hill, who had conferred immense benefit, not only on this country, but on the whole civilized world, receive a moderate remuneration for his scheme? He trusted that Sir Rowland Hill would not only receive the sum proposed by the noble Viscount, but that the example would be followed by the whole civilized world.

MR. MARSH remarked that the hon. Member for Lambeth had mentioned that another gentleman had advocated the scheme of cheap postage. It might be so; but the difference between Sir Rowland Hill and that gentleman was, that the one had succeeded in making his suggestion a reality, while the other had not. It reminded him of the old story of Cobbett, who said, "I prophesied that, but never told anybody." The whole country would be grateful to the noble Viscount at the head of Her Majesty's Government for the proposition before the Committee.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, he fully concurred in the proposition before the Committee, but he would venture to suggest that, vast as were the advantages of the penny postage system, it had its disadvantages also, for it enabled puffing tradesmen to cover gentlemen's tables with their circulars. Perhaps those individuals would be less prodigal with their penny stamps if they knew that, as a rule, their circulars were almost invariably consigned unread to the waste-paper basket.

MR. COX said, he should be sorry if the feelings of the metropolis on this subject were supposed to be represented by the hon. Member for Lambeth. He was quite sure there was not a man in the metropolis who would not approve of the Vote. As to the subscription to Sir Rowland Hill, he was fully entitled to it. He thought it a gracious way of acknowledging the debt of gratitude they were all under to Sir Rowland Hill for the suggestion that he made, and for the ability with which he carried it into effect.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, having been Chancellor of the Exchequer at the time Sir Rowland Hill introduced his scheme, he wished to bear his testimony to the value of the services of that eminent public servant. The difficulties were great, and at the time there was a strong feeling against it in many quarters, but Sir Rowland Hill, by his calm good sense, intelligence, and good humour, encountered and overcame them all.

MR. NEATE said, he had the honour of being private Secretary of the right hon. Baronet who had just addressed the House, at the time the scheme was brought forward; and he wished to state that his right hon. Friend, in the panegyric he had just bestowed on Sir Rowland Hill, had forgotten his own share in developing the plan. He hoped the House would not lose sight of the patronage which Sir Rowland Hill had received from his official superior.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask the noble Viscount at the head of the Government how it happened that Sir Rowland Hill always held a subordinate office, and was never made Postmaster General, an office which was reserved for Dukes and Earls? As Postmaster General he would have received £5,000 a year. In any other country in Europe, a man like Sir Rowland Hill would have been rewarded with such an appointment, and not been left in a subordinate post.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: There is one very good reason why it would not have been an advantage to Sir Rowland Hill to have made him Postmaster General, it is, that he would not have received any increase of salary while he held the office, but would have to go out with a change of Government. The hon. Member for Lambeth doubted whether the Post Office paid its expenses. In answer to that, I beg to state that the net revenue for last year, after paying expenses, was £1,790,000.

Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH said, it was a very remarkable thing that the practice should have sprung up of appointing Peers only to the office of Postmaster General, which was strictly of a commercial and mechanical character. The practice seemed to have grown up without any express warrant in the middle of last century, and he believed it to be a remnant of the old days of corruption in the department.

Mr. WHITE said, the noble Lord had forgotten to deduct from his estimate of Post Office revenues the sum of £1,000,000 for packet services. That would reduce the net revenue to £790,000. At the same time, he regarded the present proposition as one of the most creditable acts of the present Government.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £48,548, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the Salaries and Expenses in the Office of the Committee of Privy Council for Trade, including the Office of the Registrar of Merchant Seamen, the Joint Stock Companies Registration Office, and the Designs Office."

Mr. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he wished to ask for some explanation of the increase which had taken place under the head of the Board of Trade since 1859. A new office of Secretary of the Marine Department, at a salary rising to £1,500 a year, had been created, and a new class of clerks called assistants to secretaries. It was not impossible that these new titles might have been introduced in order to get rid of some persons under the pretence that the offices to which they belonged had been abolished. Some information would likewise be acceptable as to the Meteorological Department. He wished to know what was the whole expense of the Meteorological Department. The weather returns were quite fallacious, and it was a pity that they should be issued in their present form, thereby deceiving the public.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, that the Vote for the Board of Trade contained a greater increase than any other estimate. No less than four new places were created in the department, involving a very considerable expenditure. With respect to the appointment of temporary clerks, he would be bound to say, that if a permanent selection of proper men were made, a great step would be accomplished both in point of economy and efficiency.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON said, the increase had arisen from various causes, and especially from changes made in the organization of the office, with a view to render it more efficient. It was true that some new places had been created, but some old places had been abolished. One principal cause of the increase of expenditure had been the increased amount of business which the Board had had to perform. There had been a considerable transfer of new business from the Admiralty in reference to harbours, and an increased establishment was therefore necessary. The whole increase was £3,363 over 1863-4; but this increase was absolutely necessary from the causes he had mentioned. As to the meteorological predictions, nobody, of course, pretended that Admiral Fitzroy had always foretold the weather, but no great storm had occurred which he had not foretold. The science of meteorology was at present experimental, and this was perfectly well understood by the House and the country. The experience gained by Admiral Fitzroy had been most useful, but sufficient time had not elapsed to enable the House to decide whether the establishment was of such a character as entitled it to be permanently supported by a vote of the House.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he had been a witness to the dreadful accident which had occurred the other day on the South Western Railway. Two carriages were mixed up together, and three persons were entangled in the ruins. One was dead, and two were almost dead. They died before the eyes of the bystanders, who were unable to give them the least assistance. In the days of the road every coach or carriage used to carry a small tool-box in case of accident. If there had been ropes, hammers, and hatchets, by which the wreck might have been cleared away, two or three lives would have been saved. Could not the Inspectors of Railways of the Board of Trade insist upon some such apparatus being carried by every train so as to admit of effectual and speedy assistance being rendered in the event of an accident.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he wished to ask for some explanation respecting the superannuations of the registrar and librarian of the Board of Trade.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the office of registrar had been abolished by the recommendation of the Treasury. The office of librarian was now discharged by a subordinate, at a reduced salary. In respect to the observations of the hon. and gallant Member for Limerick (Colonel Dickson), in reference to the late railway accident, he had to observe that the power of the inspectors was small as regarded the general management of railways. All the inspectors could do in regard to the late accident was to hold an inquiry. That inquiry was being held, and he was bound to say that the railway authorities furnished every facility for the most thorough investigation. That accident might no doubt be the means of adopting some such precautionary measures as the hon. and gallant Member suggested.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that Mr. Edgar Bowring, who filled the office of registrar and librarian, at a salary of £800 a year, had been superannuated at the age of thirty-eight on £426 per annum. Another gentleman had been appointed librarian at £456 a year. He should oppose the Vote unless some explanation could be given.

MR. PEEL said, it was thought an improvement in the organization that the secretary should control the establishment—a duty which had formerly been discharged by the registrar. The office of registrar was, therefore, no longer required, and it was abolished, his duty of librarian being given to an officer of inferior salary.

Motion made, and Question,

"That the Item of £450, for the Salary of Librarian to the Board of Trade, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—(Mr. Augustus Smith),

—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Cox),—put, and negatived.

(3.) £1,908, Lord Privy Seal.

MR. COX said, he should move to report Progress, and he was resolved to divide the Committee upon the Motion. He had been in the House until two o'clock on the previous day, and he had been there also from twelve o'clock on the previous day until the present hour (twelve o'clock).

Colonel Dickson

COLONEL DICKSON said he was sorry that the constant attendance of the hon. Member was such an impediment to public business. He hoped the hon. Member would allow a fair chance of having the Estimates discussed.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Cox.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 7; Noes 59: Majority 52.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £5,744, Civil Service Commissions.

(5.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £14,491, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1866, for the Salaries and Expenses in the Department of Her Majesty's Paymaster General, including the Branch Pay Office in Dublin."

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Hennessy.)

After a short conversation,

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, if this Vote were passed the Government would consent to Progress being reported.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that the duties of the Paymaster General were performed by deputy, and he wished to know if any change were contemplated by the Government in reference to that department of the army?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could hold out no hope of any change in the constitution of the Pay Office. An alteration would only entail expense, without affording any advantage upon the present system, which was a good one.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported on Monday next; Committee to sit again on Monday next.

[QUEEN'S MESSAGE, 6TH JUNE.]

Resolution reported,

"That the annual sum of One Thousand Pounds be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain and Ireland, the said Annuity to commence from the 20th day of November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and to be settled in the most beneficial manner upon Mary Louisa, Countess of Elgin and Kincardine, widow of the late James, Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, Her Majesty's Viceroy and Governor General of India, for the term of her natural life."

MR. GREGSON said, he wished to quote the following passage from a congratulatory address to the Earl of Elgin from the members of the East India and China Association, to show the appreciation in which his services were held:—

"We beg leave to offer to your Lordship our cordial congratulations on the distinguished success which has crowned your exertions as Her Majesty's High Commissioner and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Peking, by the conclusion of a treaty which, when fully in operation, will secure to Her Majesty's subjects a commercial intercourse of the greatest importance with that vast empire. Your Lordship's similarly successful negotiations with Japan, and the prospect of the early opening of her commerce to British and European enterprise, no less demand our acknowledgments and our congratulations. Trusting that your Lordship may speedily witness and long enjoy the satisfaction of contemplating the complete success of your labours in that increase of our national prosperity which they are so eminently calculated to promote, we have the honour to be, with the highest consideration and respect, your Lordship's most obedient servants."

The Earl of Elgin, in his reply, thus explained the objects to which his diplomacy had been directed, and the manner in which advantage might be derived from its success:—

"The treaties recently concluded with China and Japan have in a great measure removed the obstacles to intercourse between those countries and the world, without which the jealousy, exclusiveness, and apprehensions of their despotic Governments had created. To the attainment of this end the efforts of diplomacy have been directed with some success; but its action extends no further; it rests with our merchants and manufacturers to complete the work by turning these new facilities to account, and establishing mutually beneficial relations between England and those countries, inhabited as they are by populations numerous, industrious, and commercially disposed. . . . For my own part, I have only to say that it is my sincere desire to continue to co-operate with you in the noble work of extending the blessings of commerce and Christian civilization to those remote and interesting regions of the earth."

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MASSEY, Viscount PALMERSTON, and Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.

GREEK LOAN (CONSOLIDATED FUND).

"That Her Majesty be authorised to relinquish, in favour of King George the First, the King of the Hellenes, during his reign, the sum of Four Thousand Pounds sterling a year, and to that extent to release the Greek Treasury from the obligation of a certain arrangement, concluded at Athens in the month of June, 1860, in reference to the Greek Loan."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY wished to know how the Consolidated Fund was affected by the Resolution. If he understood the Resolution, it seemed that there was a sum of £4,000 a year which we claimed against the Greek Government, and which was now to be handed over to the King of the Greeks as a present.

THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Baronet need be under no apprehension that the Consolidated Fund would suffer. It was a mere question of foregoing a portion of a claim upon the Greek Government. The protecting Powers had agreed to forego each the payment of £4,000 a year from Greece, and the Resolution would but relieve Greece from remitting that amount annually to this country.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he would remind the House that the Greek Government had undertaken to pay pensions to certain civil servants of Great Britain. He thought it was a strange proceeding to abandon a debt due from Greece, while at the same time we were leaving our public servants to the mercy of the Greek Government.

Resolution agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MASSEY, Viscount PALMERSTON, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. LAYARD.

THE COUNTESS OF ELGIN AND
QUEEN'S MESSAGE OF MONDAY LAST.

Order of the Day for the consideration of the QUEEN'S MESSAGE of Monday last read.

MESSAGE read.

EARL GRANVILLE : My Lords, in accordance with the Notice I have given, I have to ask your Lordships' concurrence to the Message which has just been read ; and I have little doubt that your Lordships' sense of justice will induce you to cordially acquiesce in the course which I propose. I think, at the same time, it would not be respectful to your Lordships if I did not make a short statement as to the necessity of the case and the circumstances which form the ground of a debt of gratitude from this country to the late Lord Elgin. Your Lordships are all aware that Lord Elgin's name was especially dear to the northern portion of this island. Lord Elgin distinguished himself at Eton, and he subsequently achieved the highest distinctions at the University. It is a remarkable fact that of those who were his contemporaries, and with whom he associated at the University, there were six persons to whom the country looked up as likely for a long period to take a prominent part in the legislative and administrative affairs of the country. Of those five friends of his, only one now remains in perfect health and strength, and able to discharge public duties. Sidney Herbert, afterwards Lord Herbert, is no more. Your Lordships on both sides of the House, without reference to party, the other day expressed your feelings of regret that the Duke of Newcastle is in that state of health which gives little hope that he can ever again take an active part in administering the public business of the country. With regard to these two, it would be difficult to say that their labours, administrative and Parliamentary, and the courageous way in which they remained in harness to the last moment after their health had been attacked, may not have contributed to the injury of their constitutions. But of one thing we may feel perfectly certain, that with regard to the three contemporaries who succeeded each other in the government of India, in consequence of the responsibilities of their high office, and the discharge of their arduous duties in a climate of so unhealthy a character, they fell in the public service as much as Sir John Moore at Corunna and Nelson at Trafalgar. After leaving the University, Lord Elgin took his seat in the other House of Parliament, and made one good speech on a question of considerable importance. Almost immediately afterwards his father died, and he was condemned by our Constitution to that anomalous position in which Scotch Peers who do not obtain a majority of the votes of their brethren are debarred from taking any part in the work of either House of Parliament. Lord Elgin was shortly afterwards appointed to the office of Governor of Jamaica, and I believe he was the youngest Governor who ever left these shores. He carried on and consolidated the work which Lord Metcalfe projected and had partly carried out. For four years he remained there, and for the succeeding eight years he was Governor General of the important colony of Canada; and now that all party feeling is abated, I may say that by the maintenance of strictly constitutional principles in that colony, in the opinion of those best acquainted with the subject, he did much to preserve the loyalty of the people and their attachment to the Crown of this country. I may mention that during his tenure of office in Canada he was appointed to negotiate a most important treaty with the United States of America. On his return to this country he was sent to China to conduct negotiations which, it must be obvious to your Lordships, were of a most difficult character. He successfully negotiated the Treaty of Tien-tsin. On coming back he joined the Government, in which he filled the office of Postmaster General. But in consequence of difficulties having arisen through the Emperor of China refusing to ratify the Treaty of Tien-tsin, Lord Elgin was requested to go out again to China ; and your Lordships will remember the successful manner in which he conducted the subsequent negotiations. He thought he was fully rewarded by the opportunity afforded him of showing his disinterestedness when he was met by information of the rebellion in India, and took upon himself the responsibility of assenting to Lord Canning's request for the diversion of the troops placed under his orders for the war in China, and sending them to assist in quelling the Indian mutiny.

At the same time, Lord Elgin himself proceeded to Calcutta, and we may imagine the feelings that arose in his breast when he found that one of the few faces which were unblanched with fear was that of his early college friend, the late distinguished Governor General of India. After that he proceeded to China, having given Lord Canning all the assistance in his power. He was again perfectly successful in China. At the same he had an opportunity of going to Japan, and there making a most important treaty of commerce. On his return to this country, he again joined the Government; but on the death of Lord Canning, he was sent out to fill that most important office, the Governor Generalship of India. My Lords, it has been said that Lord Elgin went out not without some anticipation that he should not return to this country; but I am informed, on good authority, founded on the statement of his medical adviser, that his health was perfectly sound when he went there. He went out, and I believe he deserved all the credit bestowed upon him for the judgment with which he conducted affairs until he was struck down by the effects of the fatal climate; and after passing through the most expensive part of his career, he was thus without the means of saving money. This, it is expected, a Governor General will generally be able to do, and a larger salary is given them for that purpose. But I am sure your Lordships will feel that one who lived in honourable exile from his country on very small means for the support of himself and his family is justly entitled to some recognition on the part of the nation. It is proposed that, in addition to an annual grant of £1,000 to be found by the Indian Government out of the Indian revenue, another £1,000 be paid annually to Lady Elgin out of the Consolidated Fund. I cannot help thinking that your Lordships will cheerfully concur in the Vote I have the honour to propose, not only from your generous feelings, but also from a perfect sense of justice. The noble Earl concluded with his Motion.

Moved,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty to return Her Majesty the Thanks of this House for Her Majesty's most gracious Message informing this House 'that Her Majesty, taking into consideration the distinguished services performed throughout a long series of years by the late James Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, Her Majesty's Viceroy and Governor General of India, is desirous, in recognition of such Services, to confer some signal Mark of her Favour upon his Widow Mary Louisa Countess of Elgin and Kincardine;' and to assure Her Majesty that this House will cheerfully concur in such Measures as may be necessary for securing to Mary Louisa Countess of Elgin and Kincardine a pension of £1,000 a year for her natural life"—(The Lord President).

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, although I cordially concur in everything which has fallen from the noble Earl, which must, I am sure, have had the full assent of the House; still I hope to be permitted to say a few words in favour of the Motion. I only knew Lord Elgin as a public man. I had occasion to see him before his first and second missions to China, and I was with him for some time before he proceeded to India, and from the first moment that I became acquainted with his public sentiments he acquired my most entire confidence, which he continued to deserve and retain. Lord Elgin's first mission to China was of a most delicate and unusual character, for he had, in conjunction with the envoy of the French Government, to direct the proceedings of the joint forces—military and naval—of the two Powers. The two nations did not stand in exactly the same position in regard to divers matters in China, and Lord Elgin and the French Envoy had different interests to support; but it was to the credit of Lord Elgin that, during the time over which the proceedings lasted, no one point of dispute arose between the two nations, or between the armies of the two nations, and the result was that the operations which he conducted in China were brought to a happy conclusion to the most entire satisfaction of the Government of this country. That having been the case, Lord Elgin returned to England, naturally desirous, after his twelve years of service, to have some rest at home, having passed almost the whole public part of his life abroad in the discharge of great public duties. But difficulties arose with the Chinese Government as to the performance of their obligations under the treaty. A great naval disaster occurred at the mouth of the Peiho, and it was thought right by Her Majesty's Government—and I believe they were perfectly justified in so thinking—to request Lord Elgin again to proceed to the scene of his former labours. I said at that time, and I now repeat, that I do not recollect any occasion on which any public servant has been called upon to make so great a sacrifice as was then required of Lord Elgin. Not only had he to forego all the rest and comfort of home to which a man is justly entitled after a long period of public service, but he was asked to encounter the risk of losing that great reputation which he had already acquired, in again engaging in somewhat similar, but much greater, operations against an enemy, with a very much larger force, and on a coast on which it was exceedingly doubtful whether a landing could safely be effected, and in a country where it was equally doubtful whether operations could be successfully carried on, and under circumstances in which the great object was to get to the capital of China for the purpose of there securing a permanent and honourable peace. These were the great objects in view, but the difficulties were very great indeed; but these difficulties Lord Elgin surmounted. I know that many persons in this country, looking from a great distance at the operations in China, and seeing that they are conducted with almost uniform success, imagine that that success is obtained with great facility. There cannot be a greater fallacy. Depend upon it that no great public result is ever obtained by small efforts or without the exercise of more than ordinary talents. It is said that fortune is very capricious, but fortune, although not always faithful, generally shows a decided partiality to those who most deserve her favour. When Lord Elgin proceeded to India as Governor General, I viewed his appointment with the most entire satisfaction. Able, prudent, resolute, unimpassioned, he appeared of all men to be the best qualified to act in the true spirit of Her Majesty's wise and beneficent proclamation to the people of India; to calm the animosities between the native and English races by impartial justice, and to make both races forget the past in their common advance to an amount hitherto unknown of material prosperity obtained by enlightened legislation. Unfortunately it did not seem good to Providence that Lord Elgin should be permitted to complete that great work of reconciliation, without which there is no permanent security for our dominion in India. After a very short illness—full of honour but not full of years—he terminated a life in which there had been no rest, which had been entirely devoted in every part of the world to the performance of great and arduous public duties. My Lords, we may express, as we feel, great grief for the loss we have sustained, added as it has been to the loss of so many other considerable men connected with the service of India, whose counsels we had reason to hope that we might for many years have enjoyed; we acknowledge his merits, and it only remains for us to make such provision, as far as we can, for his noble widow—that anxiety for the future may not increase the poignancy of the grief with which she must ever look back upon the memory of the glorious and happy past.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, although it is not my intention to detain your Lordship, by entering into any detail of the eminent services of Lord Elgin, which have been dwelt on most properly by the Lord President of the Council and by the noble Earl near me, I cannot deny myself the gratification at least of paying to his memory, in a very few words, the high tribute of public respect and personal regard which is due to so eminent a public servant. My official connection with Lord Elgin began at the very commencement of his official career. Since the time when he quitted Jamaica I had no official communication with him; but, at the same time, knowing how admirably he had discharged his duties there, I watched his subsequent career with unflagging interest; and I have upon every occasion been happy to say, that that career has been distinguished by a combination of qualities most rarely met with in the same individual—the qualities of great decision, of great firmness, at the same time of great caution and great conciliation. Above all, Lord Elgin on every occasion showed us, as has been already said by the noble Earl, the most admirable and entire disinterestedness, and the most absolute abnegation of self. His whole heart was in his work, and in his country's service. He considered no personal sacrifice for a moment in competition with the great objects which he had to effect, and the great work in which he was engaged. It was impossible, upon an occasion of this kind, not to advert, as the noble Earl has done, to the mysterious dispensation of Providence by which, within the course of a very few years, the country has been deprived of the services of so many of those who had already attained to high political distinction, but who might naturally have looked forward to obtain still higher distinction, and whom the country might have expected to see adding to the services which they had performed and to the honours to which they had already attained. My Lords, the hopes which we might reasonably have entertained have in too many cases been destroyed, but I am convinced that the country will not forget the services of such men ; and I am sure that with the names of Dalhousie, of Canning, of Herbert, and of Cornwall Lewis—I hope I may not have to add another name to the too long list of the honourable and distinguished men who have within a few years perished in the service of the State—that of Elgin will be honourably associated in the universal tribute which the country will pay to their meritorious services, and the deep regret which all must feel at the untimely disappearance of such men from among us. My Lords, I need not add that I cordially concur in the Motion of the noble Earl.

Address Ordered, Nomine Dissentiente, to be presented to Her Majesty, to return Her Majesty the thanks of this House for Her Majesty's most gracious Message informing this House,

“That Her Majesty, taking into consideration the distinguished Services performed throughout a long Series of Years by the late James, Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, Her Majesty's Viceroy and Governor General of India, is desirous, in recognition of such Services, to confer some signal mark of Her Favour upon his Widow, Mary Louisa, Countess of Elgin and Kincardine ;” and to assure Her Majesty that this House will cheerfully concur in such Measures as may be necessary for securing to Mary Louisa, Countess of Elgin and Kincardine, a Pension of £1,000 a Year for her natural Life.—(The Lord President.)

THE ASSIZE TOWN.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE, in calling attention to the late decision of the Privy Council for the removal of the West Riding Assizes from York to Leeds, and moving an Address to Her Majesty thereon, said that this decision was entirely opposed to the evidence submitted to them. In 1829 a Commission was appointed to consider the advisability of removing the Assizes for the West Riding from York, and, if so, to which town they should be removed; and the result of the inquiry was unconditionally in favour of Wakefield. In 1857 another Commission was appointed, and the decision arrived at was different from the one which had been adopted by the Privy Council. In 1860 a Commission was appointed at the suggestion of Sir G. C. Lewis, and out of 107 magistrates who were examined upon the matter 99 were opposed to any change. In 1863, by the direction of Sir George Grey, a circular was sent to the magistrates of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and out of 329 magistrates answers were received from 266. The circular asked if the magistrates to whom it was addressed thought it desirable to remove the Assizes from York, and, if so, whether to Leeds or Wakefield, or to Leeds and Sheffield. The answers in favour of the last plan were so few that they might be entirely discarded. Of the remainder, 123 were in favour of retaining the Assizes at York, 87 in favour of a change to Wakefield, and 20 only approved the removal to Leeds. At the beginning of the present year a private circular was addressed to the magistrates of the West Riding, and 187 of those who replied were in favour of Wakefield, and only 89 in favour of Leeds. He thought that the opinions of these gentlemen ought to be taken into consideration, as they came from men who took an interest in the subject, and whose opinions were dictated by experience. There were some other points to which he would call their Lordships' attention, as he believed them to be material to the question. The population of the West Riding in the immediate neighbourhood of Wakefield was over 900,000, while in the neighbourhood of Leeds it was only 623,000, thus showing an advantage of about 30 per cent in favour of Wakefield. Wakefield contained the county prison and almost all the other public offices, and it was of great importance that the Assizes should be held where these public buildings were to be found. Now, against all the public buildings of Wakefield, Leeds had nothing to urge but the presence of the Bankruptcy Court. If the Assizes were held at Leeds and the West Riding gaol remained at Wakefield, as there was a distance of ten miles between the two towns, the prisoners would have to be conveyed by train in the morning and taken back in the evening until their cases had been decided, and these journeys would not unfrequently occur daily for an entire week. The country near Leeds was densely populated, the population being chiefly of an artisan character, and they might safely anticipate serious inconvenience from the necessity of carrying prisoners forward and back, especially in times of political riots or tumults ; and in this opinion the governor of the gaol at Wakefield fully concurred. It was estimated that the expense consequent upon those frequent removals would amount to £150 an assize, and as there were three Assizes held in the course of the year, the Riding would be called upon to pay £450 because of the decision of the Privy Council. After giving the question a full consideration, he could not conceive on what grounds the Privy Council had come to a decision so opposed to that of all those whose experience upon the subject entitled their opinions to respect. Wakefield was looked upon as the capital of the West Riding, and if the Assizes were to be removed from York, a large majority of the magistrates were in favour of its selection in preference to Leeds. When they were told that the decision was to rest with the Privy Council, they did not anticipate that Yorkshire would be little represented, the noble Earl the Secretary for War (Earl de Grey and Ripon) being the only Yorkshire Peer who was on the Committee of Privy Council by which the decision was arrived at. Every other Peer in Yorkshire was in favour of Wakefield. Under those circumstances he hoped that their Lordships would perceive that there were good grounds of complaint against the decision which had been arrived at, and would give their support to the Motion.

Moved,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the late Decision of the Privy Council, ordering the Removal of the West Riding Assizes from York to Leeds instead of to Wakefield, be re-considered.—(Lord Wharncliffe).

LORD HOUGHTON said, he had not been able to refuse the request of the noble Lord to give his support to this Motion. Upon this question he believed that the gentry of Yorkshire were so united, and their opinions were so well formed, that he could not understand what possible motives could have induced the Government to issue an Order in Council which was in entire opposition to their wishes and their supposed interests. He trusted that it would not be supposed that in opposing the transference of the Assizes from York to Leeds the gentry of Yorkshire were influenced by personal feelings. They were ready to perform their public duties whatever place might be selected. It was impossible to understand why the Government had made repeated requests to the magistrates for their opinions, when at last they had acted in direct opposition to those opinions. A large majority of the magistrates of Yorkshire had decided that they were quite content with York as the assize town, and there could be no doubt that the central position of that city and other circumstances rendered it well adapted for the administration of justice. It was true, however, that as the West Riding was more populous than the other Ridings, a considerable expense was incurred in bringing witnesses and prisoners to York; but if considerations of economy were to be permitted to override all other considerations, then assuredly the natural course would have been to remove the administration of justice to the place where justice could be most cheaply administered—to the capital of the West Riding. At Wakefield there was a very large prison; it was a town of moderate size, and was singularly well adapted for an assize town. Instead of going to Wakefield, however, the Government had thought fit to transfer the Assizes to a town with a large manufacturing population. The mere fact of Leeds being a larger town than York or Wakefield was no recommendation—if, indeed, its size ought not rather to operate against its selection. He thought their Lordships would do well to induce the Government to reconsider their determination, which was so much opposed to the general feeling of Yorkshire. He did not think the opinion of the magistracy of the county should be disregarded. He would submit that this was not a time to cast discouragement upon the magisterial station, so as to prevent younger men from accepting its duties and its responsibilities. It was the duty of Parliament, whenever it had an opportunity, to sustain the magisterial dignity, and he, therefore, felt confident that their Lordships would give their support to this Motion.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he felt bound, in the first place, to thank the noble Lord who introduced the subject for his singularly clear and able statement, and he hoped that in future they might frequently have the advantage of the noble Lord's participation in their debates. The complaints of the noble Lord referred to three points; first as to the removal of the Assizes from York; next to the selection of Leeds in preference to Wakefield; and, lastly, to a point which more immediately affected himself, and with which he would first deal. Their Lordships were aware that Her Majesty was empowered by Act of Parliament, with the advice of her Privy Council, to make division and arrangement as to holding Assizes at particular times. The question as to which particular town should be selected had been raised in the House of Commons, and the claims of Wakefield in preference to Leeds had been negatived; and after that the Privy Council had been called upon to deal with the subject. It would have been improper to delay bringing this subject before Her Majesty merely on the chance that their Lordships' House would express some opinion upon it. He might remind his noble Friend that it had been quite open to him to moot this question at an earlier period, seeing that the decision of the House of Commons was pronounced some weeks since. With respect to the removal of the Assizes from York, the noble Lord had referred to the adverse opinions pronounced by two former Commissions. With respect to the first of these Commissions, he could only observe that it was impossible to attach much value to the Report of a Commission made forty years ago, when the circumstances of the country were wholly different—when no railways were in operation, and when no data existed applicable to the present times. With respect to the second Commission, its conclusions were no doubt entitled to full consideration; but it must be borne in mind that there did not exist at that time the same strong feeling as now prevailed that the Assizes should be transferred. The noble Lord had referred to the opinions expressed by the magistrates of Yorkshire, and he could assure the noble Lord that those opinions had received full and careful consideration; but the Privy Council had not felt themselves to be bound by those opinions as to the nature of the advice which they should tender to Her Majesty. The noble Lord had referred to the delicate question of the selection of Leeds, instead of Wakefield; and he asked what were the motives which had induced Her Majesty's Government to make such a selection? All he could say was that Her Majesty's Government had no motive whatever except this—when once they had made up their minds that the West Riding was entitled to an assize town, to select that town which they thought the best situated for the purpose. It should be borne in mind that when it was proposed to make Liverpool an assize town there was the same opposition on the part of the magistrates of Lancashire. His noble Friend should remember that Wakefield and Leeds were not the only candidates—Sheffield had put in a claim—and in selecting Leeds instead of Wakefield the only motive the Government could have was the public advantage. He might appeal to his noble Friends who sat on the Committee, whether they were not of opinion that the balance of advantage was on the side of Leeds? The noble Lord had referred to the petitions in favour of Wakefield; but he was aware that these had been strongly criticised on the other side, and the argument turned entirely in favour of Leeds. With regard to the accommodation of the two towns, the evidence went to this extent—the accommodation at Leeds was ample and excellent, whereas there was no accommodation at Wakefield for assize business. The decision was very much influenced by that consideration. He did not know whether the noble Lord intended to press his Motion to a division; if so, he should have to oppose it. He did not think it could lead to any practical result.

LORD WENSLEYDALE addressed some remarks to the House, but the noble and learned Lord was not heard.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he remembered for the last fifty or sixty years to have heard this subject frequently discussed by members of the profession and the public; and he certainly recollected that whilst the preponderance of opinion was strong amongst both learned and unlearned against any removal from York at all, yet if there were to be any assize town at all, the almost universal feeling was in favour of Leeds. Some few persons were in favour of Wakefield, hardly any were in favour of Sheffield, and there were none at all who were in favour of Hull.

LORD FAVERSHAM protested against the statement of the noble and learned Lord who had just spoken. When he had the honour of representing Yorkshire, between thirty and forty years ago, the question of the removal of the Assizes from York was largely discussed; and in the course of his canvass he was frequently asked whether he would support Wakefield as the assize town for the West Riding, but he had never heard the town of Leeds put before Wakefield. To remove the Assizes from York would be an act of gross injustice—an act opposed by the great majority of the county magistrates, and calculated to subject the population generally to grievous inconvenience. Some time ago he took the liberty of asking whether the Government intended to persist in their determination to convert Leeds into an assize town to the prejudice of York; but he was sorry to say that the President of the Council, with some slight discourtesy, did not favour him with an answer to his question. He did not wish to impute motives, but he knew the influence which had been at work. Leeds had been written up by one of its representatives, whom he now saw standing at the bar. ["Order!"] And he did not intend to impute any motives but a sense of public duty to that gentleman; but he had worked long and zealously at the matter, and it was no doubt through his influence that the Government had been brought to countenance a measure for which no valid reason could be urged.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, the noble Lord (Lord Faversham) had referred to his canvass of the county in 1826; but he trusted their Lordships would not decide a question of this kind on a consideration of the state of things which existed between thirty and forty years ago. One of the questions raised in connection with this subject was whether a separate Assize should be given to the West Riding of Yorkshire, and a large portion of the opposition to the decision of the Privy Council sprung from those who desired to have no transfer of assizes at all from York. He (Earl De Grey and Ripon) sympathized with the feelings which actuated them; because, in the first place, in favour of the retention of the Assizes at York there were obvious considerations of personal convenience and comfort which, if great public interests were not concerned, it would be undesirable to overlook; and because, in the next place, the sentiments were very natural of those who looked upon the Assizes as the last link which bound the three Ridings together—for the Assizes and the High Sheriff were all that remained of the united county. But it was not upon considerations of this nature that the Privy Council could decide the question. They had to consider the amount of population and the amount of business to be done. The population of the West Riding was one million and a half, or scarcely less than the population of the whole of Lancashire, which would have three assize towns—Lancaster, Liverpool, and the newly created Assizes at Manchester. It seemed impossible, with this state of things, to resist the claim of the West Riding to have a separate Assize. Accordingly the Privy Council decided that a separate Assize should be given to the West Riding. The question then to be raised was, to what town these Assizes

were to be given. It is said that the opinion of the Privy Council in favour of Leeds was against the opinion of the majority of the magistrates; but then the majority of the magistrates was against having a separate Assize at all. He knew from his own observation that there was a widespread feeling among the mercantile and manufacturing classes in the West Riding in favour of having justice brought nearer to them, and although, as had been said, a majority of the county magistrates were against the removal of the assizes from York, yet of those who thought otherwise by far the larger number preferred Leeds to Wakefield. Since then the Government had decided to have a separate Assize for the West Riding, they must consider how best their wishes to consult the convenience of the population were to be acted upon. Their object was to bring the Assizes to the bulk of the population. Their Lordships had been told that the population in and around Leeds was less than that in and around Wakefield. Statistics prepared by rival parties were necessarily of a very doubtful character, but it was only fair to mention that the statement on the other side was precisely the contrary, and that the Privy Council arrived at their decision with the fact before them, that the population of Wakefield was only 23,000, as against 207,000 at Leeds. It had been pointed out by Mr. Reeyes that sufficient accommodation did not exist at Wakefield, and if the Assizes were taken there it would be necessary to build a new court, whereas at Leeds the present courts were amply sufficient. With regard to railway accommodation, the communication by rail was more direct and speedy with Leeds from the various parts of the Riding than it was with Wakefield. There was another point—that if the Assizes were removed to Wakefield it would bar for all time the claim of Sheffield on account of the proximity of Wakefield to that town, whilst Leeds was so far away that if the Assizes were removed to that town Sheffield would not be prejudiced by the decision. He had understood and heard the learned Lord (Lord Wensleydale)—whom, however, he had heard very indistinctly—to say that it was very undesirable to hold Assizes in large towns; but all modern changes had been in that direction—for instance, appointing Assizes to be held at Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle; so that the Committee of Council could not be charged with having established a new principle. The question was, no doubt, one on which much could be said on both sides; but on the whole, he believed that the Committee had adopted the arrangement which was best for the cheap and speedy administration of justice.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I am not a Yorkshireman, and although I have some physical knowledge of the locality in question, yet I know nothing of the merits of this case except from an examination of those papers which have been laid before the House. I agree with the noble Earl who has just sat down (Earl de Grey and Ripon), that this question ought not to be decided by reference to the state of opinion that existed thirty-eight years ago; and still more, I think, that we ought not to be guided by the state of feeling which existed fifty or sixty years ago, and to which the noble and learned Lord (Lord Brougham) referred. But let us consider what has been the state of feeling for the last few years; and I think it is quite impossible to deny the fact, that the great balance of opinion on the part of the Commissioners who were appointed to inquire into the subject, on the part of the magistrates who are interested in the administration of justice, and a great proportion of the inhabitants of the county, and also on the part of the surveyor who was sent down by the Government specially to report upon the matter, was strongly in favour of the Assizes being held at Wakefield. The noble Earl who has just sat down has expended a good deal of time upon the question whether the local magistrates were or not in favour of removing the Assizes from York; and it may well be admitted that a great majority were in favour of retaining the Assizes at that place; but it being decided to remove them from York, and that the West Riding should have Assizes of its own, the question arose whether those gentlemen were of opinion that the Assizes should be removed to Wakefield, Leeds, or Sheffield, as the most convenient place? As to Sheffield there were so few in favour of it that it may be put out of the question; and as between Wakefield and Leeds, the majority in favour of Wakefield was 187 to 59. So far, therefore, as the opinion of the magistrates is to be taken for guidance, there is a very strong preponderance of feeling against Leeds. Although, as stated by the President of the Council, the Act of Parliament does not require the Council to consult the magistrates, yet, on the other hand, they are required to make such arrangements as, in their opinion, are most conducive to the convenient administration of justice; and I know no persons who could form a more satisfactory judgment upon that subject than could the local magistrates who are mainly concerned in carrying out the administration of public justice. The original Commission undoubtedly reported in favour of retaining the Assizes at York; but, presuming a change, not a single individual on that Commission reported in favour of Leeds, whilst a large number were in favour of Wakefield. Then you had the Lords Lieutenant of two Ridings, and the Vice Lieutenants of three, all in favour of Wakefield; thus coinciding with the great majority of the magistrates. Mr. Reeves, the surveyor who was sent down, it is true, reported that the accommodation for holding Assizes at Leeds was superior to that at Wakefield; but, on the other hand, he pointed out that the gaol accommodation at Wakefield was infinitely superior to that at Leeds; so that in one case it would be necessary to build an additional court, whilst in the other it would be necessary to add greatly to the gaol. Mr. Reeves reported that, looking to all the circumstances of the locality and the convenience of the great majority of the population, he was decidedly in favour of Leeds. In the face of Mr. Reeves's report, it certainly required considerable courage on the part of the noble Earl the Secretary for War to quote Mr. Reeves as a witness against Wakefield. There is only one consideration that induces me to hesitate as to the course which I should recommend my noble Friend (Lord Wharncliffe) to take. If the matter were res integra, I should not hesitate for a moment to advise him to press his motion to a division. As to the merits of the case, I have no doubt at all that they are strongly in favour of Wakefield; but the question which raises doubts in my mind is, that some difficulty might occur in consequence of the House of Commons having, by a small majority, expressed an opposite opinion to that embodied in this Motion. But that was done in the absence of those papers which are now before your Lordships. Then we have been given to understand by the noble Earl the Lord President of the Council, very decidedly, though hardly with any great courtesy, that whatever we do will not affect the decision which has been come to—that the decision is final; and though we may address the Crown, yet it rests with the Ministers to advise the Crown, and consequently it is a matter of discretion on the part of my noble Friend whether he should go to a division; but still, if he should decide on going to a division, I must record my vote in favour of his Motion. But at the same time I would suggest, whether it might not be wise not to divide, considering the inconvenience which might arise from the two Houses of Parliament expressing different opinions, and whether your Lordships would do well to send up an address to the Crown when you have a positive intimation on the part of the leading Minister in this House that the Crown will not assent to your recommendation. I leave this matter, however, entirely in the hands of my noble Friend; and, as I said before, if he divide, I shall, though with some hesitation, divide with him; but I think that it is a question upon which he would do well to reflect before he calls upon the House to divide.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE said, that standing there as he did in this case as the representative of the West Riding, he could not abandon its interests, and he should therefore take the sense of the House on his Motion.

LORD CRANWORTH, as one of those who were asked to advise the Committee of Council, said, that he must observe that he knew of no motive which influenced the decision arrived at, except such as were apparent upon the papers. No doubt the opinion of the magistrates in favour of Wakefield had great weight, so far as the criminal business was concerned; but the evidence showed that more than four civil causes to one arose in and near Leeds as compared with Wakefield. This latter consideration naturally had very great weight with the Privy Council.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he had no interest, and that he had shown no partiality in the matter, and he could assure their Lordships that, in arriving at the decision to which they had come, the Privy Council had not been biassed by any considerations other than those which were apparent on the papers. He must, however, earnestly deprecate the course which was about to be pursued by the noble Lord; and he begged him to reflect on the position in which he would place their Lordships by his first Motion in that House—a position of conflict with the House of Commons. He begged him to recollect also the position in which he would place the Crown. The Crown had already received the opinion of the other House, and that opinion was in favour of the decision arrived at by the Privy Council. Encouragement had already been given to the people of Leeds to prepare for the removal of the Assizes to their town; and now that they had laid out money for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements, common justice forbade that the decision of the Crown should be reversed. What answer could the Crown make to the people of Leeds? Was the Crown to say, "We preferred the Address of the House of Lords to that of the Commons?"

THE EARL OF DERBY observed that the House of Commons had sent up no Address.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Earl was perfectly right—there had been no Address; but the House of Commons had expressed its opinion. He earnestly hoped there would be no division; but if there was, he appealed to their Lordships not to put the Crown in the predicament in which they would place it if they agreed to the Motion.

On Question, their Lordships divided:—Contents 80; Not-Contents 54: Majority 26.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS BILL—(No. 100.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am very reluctant to trespass upon your attention, but a very eminent member of the University of Oxford feels considerable annoyance at the somewhat unwarrantable manner in which his name has been referred to in debate, and wishes that some notice should be taken of it. I refer to the Dean of Christ Church. A noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Montrose) stated the other evening that the evidence of the Dean of Christ Church was not worth much, considering that everybody knew that no young men went up to Christ Church for the purpose of reading or for the purpose of obtaining honours. Now, if your Lordships turn to the Dean's evidence, you will see that it was not applied to all the boys who go up for matriculation, but only to the average boys; and his opinions respecting their attainments certainly do not stand alone, for they are supported by other witnesses of undoubted competency. The Rev. D. P. Chase, Principal of St. Mary Hall, said,—

"In my opinion, the previous education given to the mass of those who enter the University does not fulfil satisfactorily the purpose of grounding in the classical studies which they are required to pursue. The result is that the minimum of attainment necessary for the B.A. degree is far below what it might and ought to be, while the difficulty which the majority of the passmen have in producing even that minimum necessarily restricts and narrows the course. Much of the teaching given at the University is such as ought to have been given at school. This, while it tends to weary and disgust those who have been better taught, precludes any higher teaching of those who must be kept to schoolboy work. . . . Consequently, for matriculation, it is usual to examine candidates only in authors which they have got up for the purpose. The answers to easy grammatical papers are commonly very imperfect; the Latin prose composition rarely such as would be accepted even at responsions (little-go). Deficiency in arithmetic, Euclid, and algebra frequently causes postponement of admission, and in most cases necessitates very elementary teaching afterwards."

The Rev. G. W. Kitchen, Junior Censor of Christ Church, said,—

"The average men bring up but small results of the training to which they have been subjected for years. There is a general want of accuracy in their work; even the rudimentary knowledge of grammar and Latin prose writing is far less than it ought to be. I fear that the elementary schools send the little boys up to the public schools in a very unprepared state, and that the public schools, to a great extent, assume that the boys are fairly grounded when it is not the case. The only subjects which are professed at school, and do not form part of our system of work, are such rudimentary matters as English composition, spelling, arithmetic, &c. In these there seems to be considerable deficiency. The University course of teaching is much hampered by the crude state of the men subjected to it, and by the necessity of supplementing the shortcomings of school education. Our system becomes, for average men, both narrow and vague. We feel that the most we can do for men who come up deficient in knowledge of grammar, history, language, &c., is to provide something for them to do; the time for real progress seems, in many cases, to be absolutely past."

Again, he says—

"With a matriculation examination whose standard is very low, and solely intended to prove that men have a fair chance of afterwards passing responsions, and with every wish to admit men, we have still been obliged this year to reject about one-third of the whole number who have presented themselves. . . . As to average men, their exact knowledge of grammar, &c., is now tested by us, whereas a few years ago it was almost taken for granted. This makes me diffident in expressing an opinion about its improvement or decay. On the whole, I am inclined to think it has gone backwards, for I can easily imagine it better; it would be hard to conceive it much worse."

I think this shows that the Dean of Christ Church is not alone in the evidence he gave. With regard to the charge that nobody ever heard of young men going to Christ Church with any intention of reading, the last list of Oxford University shows, as I am informed, that out of five first-classes in mathematics two are from Christ Church. In the present year Christ Church men have also gained the Ireland University Scholarship, the Junior Mathematical Scholarship, and the Oriel Fellowship; and at the end of last week another Christ Church man won the Senior Hebrew Scholarship against very good competitors. That makes three University scholarships gained this year. Taking the years 1861, 1862, 1863, the period comprised in the last University Calendar, they reckon a Radcliffe Travelling Fellowship, a Stanhope prize for history, a Gaisford prize for Greek prose; in the Moderations School, nine first classes and fourteen seconds; in the final classical schools, three first-classes and four seconds. But there is another school which has great attractions for the class of young men who are most numerous at Christ Church—the School of Law and Modern History. Last November, out of five first-class men, three were from Christ Church; and two out of five second-class men. Since the present lecturer, Mr. Owen, was appointed, three years ago, there have been twenty candidates for honours in that school. Of these five obtained a first-class, ten a second, and five a third; so that not one fell below a third. Since the first establishment of the school, in 1853, Christ Church has had seventeen first-class men, twenty second, and thirteen third. Lately, I am informed, the University has relaxed its requirements in classics a little, so that the young men will be able to give more time to these studies; and they are doing so. The examinations are becoming harder, and yet the number of candidates for honours is increasing. There are instances which are of interest to your Lordships. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) himself got a first-class in this school; so did Lord Lothian and Lord Cowper. Lately, Mr. Abbott, Lord Colchester's son, got a first-class in this school, after having gained another first in classics and the Stanhope prize; and I hope at some very distant date he will in this House display the business-like habits which have always distinguished his father here. Lord Kenyon's son has just got a second-class, and it has been stated that many of his papers were up to the mark of a first-class. My noble Friend (Lord Wodehouse) has been so long among us that I think it hardly necessary to allude to the distinctions which he gained. This list will make good the conclusion, that if no young man whatever came to read, the tutors and lecturers must have a marvellous power of overcoming the vis inertia of a large number of these resolute dunces. It appears that at the present moment there are sixty or seventy young men at Christ Church reading for honours of one kind or another.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, he had felt much pain when these remarks were made upon the evidence of the Dean of Christ Church, who was his near relation, because, not having read the Dean's evidence, he was unable from want of proper information to notice those observations at the time. The Lord President of the Council had attempted to justify, and perhaps succeeded in justifying, the evidence by bringing forward other statements of a still stronger nature as to the incompetence of boys sent up to Oxford from the public schools. But, as the remarks made the other evening had a tendency to cast blame upon the Dean, it was important to know what the evidence given by him before the Royal Commissioners really amounted to. His noble and gallant Friend (Lord De Ros) had spoken with high praise of the general character and conduct of Eton boys; and he entirely concurred in what his noble and gallant Friend had said upon this subject, and upon the great merits of that establishment. But it seemed to be assumed from the evidence of the Dean of Christ Church, that Eton boys spent their Sundays in public-houses, in smoking and drinking, and in wandering about the fields, not unfrequently in a state of intoxication; that they were not instructed in the Scriptures; that they went up to matriculation entirely ignorant, and showed a disinclination to be further instructed. Now having greatly to thank his parents for having sent him to Eton, and to the masters who taught him there, it would have given him great distress if any such evidence had been given by a man bearing his name. But, on turning to the blue-book, he found not one particle of evidence in the course of the Dean's examination which in any respect bore out these charges, and they must therefore be founded upon statements emanating from some other quarter. As to the scholarship of those who came up for matriculation from Eton and Harrow, if the Dean of Christ Church found from his own experience that these young men were ill-grounded, and that they could scarcely put into decent Latin any exercise submitted to them, he was perfectly justified in stating those facts. The Dean of Christ Church had stated in his evidence that he thought the out-of-door occupations and the amusements of boys in large public schools offered greater temptations to the neglect of study than those to which boys in smaller schools were exposed. The Dean of Christ Church was certainly correct in his statement to a certain extent; but he might have so far qualified the inference which he had drawn as to bear in mind that those temptations existed only during the summer months, when the days were long and the weather fine, when there were the attractions of cricket matches in the hay fields and boat races on the river. But during the other periods of the year the boys attended to their studies as diligently as at other schools. He had intended to dwell at some length upon the general question, but as there still remained so much business before their Lordships he should be content with referring to the evidence of his learned and accomplished relative the Dean of Christ Church.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE said, he was glad the noble Earl had had the opportunity of setting him right. He was sorry that, in the hurry of debate, he had made use of expressions that were too strong with reference to the evidence of the Dean of Christ Church. What he had intended to say was, that the expressions made use of by the Dean of Christ Church had given considerable annoyance to the authorities at Eton, because they believed that the opinions of that gentleman were not put in a manner which would give a correct impression. After saying that Eton and Westminster had not of late taken as many prizes as formerly, Rugby and Marlborough having been very successful, Mr. Sandford, Senior Censor of Christ Church, went on to say—

"It must, however, be remembered that Eton has difficulties to contend with from which the other schools are free. The parents of the boys are richer; their sons have not their fortunes to make. In fact, it has the same difficulties to cope with as we have at Christ Church. It may be said that eldest sons come to Christ Church, and younger sons go to other Colleges. The boys at the other schools, on the contrary, know that if they are to succeed they must work. The real advantage derived from Eton is less intellectual than social education. Eton is expected to make a boy a gentleman, and this expectation it fulfils. It may be added, that many boys are sent to Eton not to learn, but to form connections. We do not, however, get the élite from Eton or Harrow. Christ Church has the élite from Westminster."

The Rev. G. Kitchin, Junior Censor of Christ Church, said—

"I resigned my tutorship in 1855 and returned in 1862, and have had the opportunity of observing the state of the same class of men after an interval of seven years. They are decidedly improved, and show the effect of the great step which has been taken forward by the schools. Athletics have exerted a salutary influence on their moral condition, though there is, especially on the part of the public school men, a tendency to concentrate on sports and amusements that energy which ought to be given to work."

Dr. Liddell said, that Christ Church did not get the élite of Eton, as they mostly went to Cambridge. The success of Etonians at Cambridge was very creditable. Only last year, out of fifteen King's College men in the Classical Tripos six were Etonians, and they were all in the first class. At Oxford, in 1863, Etonians not at Christ Church carried off a scholarship at Trinity, University, Lincoln, and Corpus; while at Cambridge two Etonians obtained scholarships. The success of Etonians at Cambridge did not bear out the statement that classics only were taught at Eton. What he did say on a former occasion was, that a great number of young men did not go to Christ Church for the purpose of reading, but simply to pass away some years of their life. He would state what had been done at Christ Church since the present Dean had occupied that office. From 1856 to 1863 there were only four first-class men in classical honours at Christ Church, and of those four two were Etonians. During the same period there were thirty-one first-class men in classical honours at Balliol, of whom seven were Etonians. That fact showed that Eton did bring forward some scholars, and also that his statement with regard to Christ Church was not so unfounded as was supposed. He could not but admit that great improvement had taken place at Eton, and that there were many excellent scholars educated there. The instruction in geography and mathematics had made great progress, but he believed that French could with advantage be incorporated as a portion of the system of education.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he must attribute a certain want of discretion to the Commissioners in furnishing evidence which he thought ought not to have been published at all. They might have impressed on the country the necessity of reform of the great public schools, without going into those details. When the Duke of Wellington had won the battle of Waterloo he would not go into the question of trivial charges against a few young officers—and depend upon it he (Lord Malmesbury) was not taking a view which would not be borne out, when he said that the Commissioners had laid the ground of every sort of hostile criticism by foreign writers on the educated classes of this country and the schools at which they were brought up. He had read the Report and the evidence with an unbiassed mind, and if the statements made were true, it was most humiliating not only to those who sent their sons there, but to the whole nation. But were they true? With all respect to the Commissioners he must say he had great doubt as to whether they were true. He was at Eton, and he declared positively that it must be extremely altered, nay entirely changed, from what it was if these allegations were well founded. Among other things, the Commissioners recommended the teaching of drawing. That was quite right; but from that it might be supposed that drawing had not been taught there previously; whereas in his time a master was employed for that purpose, who was the celebrated Mr. Evans. It was intimated by the Commissioners that there was a supine state of mind on the part of the boys. All he could say was that a very different state of things prevailed from what had existed formerly, when a magazine called The

The Duke of Montrose

Etonian was published, to which Winthrop Praed was a contributor, and which contained contributions which, when he reverted to them now, he must pronounce to be of a very high class. The only consolation he had on looking at this evidence was that he really could not believe it.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON would only say a word in answer to the attack the noble Earl had thought proper to make upon the Commissioners. The noble Earl was quite unmindful of what the Commissioners had been appointed for, of their duties, and their responsibilities. Because they had taken evidence which it was their duty to take, and which was unpalatable, and because they had not garbled it, they were to be called indiscreet!

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I did not say you should have garbled it, but that you should have used discretion as to what you printed.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, the noble Earl had only expressed in other words, and with greater circumlocution, the phrase he had himself employed. The noble Earl said that, having taken evidence which it was their duty to take, they should have altered or suppressed it—and this he would have had them do, as gentlemen, as honest men, and as men responsible to the public, in order that foreigners might think better of us than we deserved. No such feeling animated him or any of his colleagues, and he should have been ashamed of himself if he had obtained the noble Earl's approbation by any such course as he had suggested. It was the duty of the masters at Eton and other schools to answer the questions of the Commissioners as to the education and morality, and the general conduct of their scholars. They all answered the questions honestly, and said that there were exceptions as to morality, and that some did go to public-houses to drink. From the tutors at Oxford the Commissioners received concurrent testimony as to the ill-preparation of the boys sent up, numbers being sent back upon matriculation. Yet all those facts were to be suppressed to make foreigners think better of us than we merited! The Commissioners would have neglected their duty if they had omitted to publish facts which would tend to bring to bear that pressure of public opinion by means of which alone a reform of our public schools could be brought about. However humiliating might be the facts stated, they were true. The noble Earl had referred to the conduct of the Duke of Wellington after the battle of Waterloo; but then the Duke had won the battle, while what the Commissioners had to do was to win the battle of school reform. The noble Earl, who had perhaps read half a dozen pages of the Report, said he did not believe the statements, but the Commissioners who had given their most careful attention to the whole subject did believe them.

LORD DE ROS said a few words, which were inaudible.

LORD REDESDALE expressed a doubt whether there were a sufficient number of masters at Eton, looking to the number of boys in the different classes. The point had not been referred to in the debate, but he hoped it would receive consideration.

THE EARL OF POWIS contravened the statement that many of those who went up to Oxford from Eton, and who were likely to inherit fortunes, did not put themselves forward for honours, and appealed to the evidence of the class lists to the contrary.

Motion agreed to: House in Committee accordingly: Amendments made: The Report thereof to be received To-morrow; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 128.)

House adjourned at half past Eight, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HERNE BAY, HAMPTON, AND RECU- VER FISHERY BILL [Lords].

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

SIR EDWARD DERING said, that although he knew it was not usual to oppose a Bill which came down from the other House of Parliament on the second reading, yet this measure was so objectionable in its character that he felt bound to ask the House to suspend the proposed legislation. The Herne Bay Company, who were the promoters of the Bill, asked to be allowed to appropriate to their own use an area of about nine square miles, which was now a very productive fishing ground, and much frequented by the fishermen of Kent and Essex. It was computed that these rights would be worth eventually £25,000, and they were asked to confer that right on a private company, who gave no equivalent and held out no corresponding benefit to the public, except the possible decrease in the price of oysters. He did not advocate any monopoly for the existing companies. There was no reason why there should not be free trade in oysters as in all other things; but there were the strongest possible grounds why such a Bill as they were asked to sanction should not be passed. It was totally and entirely without precedent. It was unprecedented to make a grant of part of the foreshore of the United Kingdom. No such grant had been made either by Parliament or the Crown for many centuries. It was only in 1843 that the rights and privileges of the fishermen of this country were confirmed by the Fishery Convention Act, one of the clauses of which defined the right of Her Majesty's subjects to fish along the coasts of the United Kingdom at three feet below water mark. The whole of the coast sought for by this Bill was anchorage ground between the Medway and the Thames. Clause 48 of the Bill, however, imposed a penalty upon any one disturbing the proposed new oyster beds.

3 G

It appeared to him that the Bill, if carried out, would interfere with the free navigation of the rivers Thames and Medway. He trusted that, at all events, the measure would be delayed until the Fishery Commission, which was pursuing its inquiries, had made its report. He had just had a petition placed in his hands from the principal salesmen in Billingsgate Market against the Bill. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

SIR BROOK BRYDGES said, he rose to second the Amendment. While the existing companies had only one square mile and a half under beds, the company by which the Bill was projected proposed to take for the purpose as many as nine square miles.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir Edward Dering.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, that by the 8 & 9 Vict. Parliament limited the power which it gave to a certain fishery company in Ireland to water-mark at spring tides, and to a limited area of the coast. The powers asked for under the present Bill were excessive, inasmuch as the company applied for 5,000 acres, whereas the grants made by Parliament to similar companies in Essex, Guernsey, and other places, never exceeded one acre.

MR. BUXTON said, he would remind the House that a Committee of the House of Lords, after a very minute inquiry, reported in favour of the Bill. He thought that the objections which had been raised could be better discussed in Committee.

MR. MASSEY said, the two main objections against the Bill were, first, that it would effect an encroachment upon the foreshores, and thereby would infringe the rights of the Crown; and, secondly, that it was important to hear the report of the Fishery Commission that was now sitting before they proceeded further with this measure. In respect to the former objection he thought that the rights of the Crown over the foreshore might be safely left in the hands of the Board of Admiralty; and in regard to the Commission, one of the Commissioners had given the strongest evidence in favour of the Bill. He might add that the result of the evidence adduced before the Committee was to produce a unanimous decision in favour of the Bill. Under these circumstances he thought that the House ought to agree to the second reading.

NAVY—NAVAL STATIONS IN THE PACIFIC.—QUESTION.

MR. WATKIN said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Her Majesty's Government, bearing in mind the existence and extension of the Naval Stations of the United States near San Francisco, and of Russia at Sitka, propose to establish any means for enabling the docking and repair of Her Majesty's ships in the North Pacific; and, if so, whether the harbour of Esquimalt has been selected as the site?

MR. CHILDERS, in reply, said, the Government had received a proposal from a company for the construction of a dock at the end of Esquimalt Bay, and asking for certain water rights, and offering that Her Majesty's ships should have access to the dock. Under certain restrictions with regard to the powers of the Indian Council, those rights had been granted, and they had also stated the number of ships that would in all probability use that dock. There was no other proposal at present on the subject, but there was a Committee now sitting upon the docks for the use of the Navy, both at home and abroad, before which the matter would come.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

QUESTION.

MR. HIBBERT said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, as the Vote for the New National Gallery at Burlington House has been rejected, it is the intention to take any steps to obtain possession of the rooms now occupied by the Royal Academy, in Trafalgar Square, so as to render the same available for the exhibition of the National Pictures?

MR. GREGORY said, he also would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take immediate steps to procure the buildings to the rear of the National Gallery, inasmuch as the present structure is not large enough properly to exhibit all the National Pictures and selections from the National Drawings?

Sir Edward Dering

MR. COWPER said, in reply, that, in order to make his answer intelligible, it was necessary that he should say a few words in explanation, for which he hoped to have the indulgence of the House. There would be no difficulty, he apprehended, in the removal of the Royal Academy to Burlington House. The Royal Academy were in possession of a considerable capital, which they had accumulated from the proceeds of their annual exhibitions, and they were prepared to spend a portion of it in providing a permanent gallery whenever they might have the opportunity of doing so. They would be prepared to build a sufficient gallery upon the Burlington House site with, he believed, only one stipulation, which was that they should have an entrance in Piccadilly, and the expense of a building which would be suitable for their purposes would be somewhere about £80,000. If, on the other hand, they had been permitted to occupy the whole of the building in Trafalgar Square, they would not, of course, have expected that that sum of £80,000 would have remained in their pockets, but they would have contributed it any way which the Government might have required, either as a credit towards the expense of the new National Gallery, or in embellishing architecturally the façade of the building in Trafalgar Square. It seemed to be immaterial to the Royal Academy whether they went or stayed; so that, as regarded them, no great difficulty existed. But as regarded the interests of the public there were certain considerations which required a good deal of attention. The building, supposing the Royal Academy should at once vacate the room which they possessed for exhibition, would not be large enough properly to exhibit the whole of the pictures which belonged to the trustees of the National Gallery. The apartments now occupied by the Royal Academy were about 7,000 superficial feet of floor area, which was not actually so large as the rooms at South Kensington, which were at present occupied by the Vernon, Jacob Bell, and other collections of British artists, and consequently even if the rooms now possessed by the Royal Academy would suffice to enable the pictures at South Kensington to be united to the rest of the gallery, they could not also provide for the better arrangement and hanging of those pictures, which were now so greatly crowded in their temporary position in the present National Gallery. Any one who had visited the Turner Gallery must have observed that the pictures were piled up from the floor to the ceiling, where they could not be seen, and in making any permanent arrangement it would be necessary that consideration should be given to the continual annual increase of pictures in the National Gallery, by purchase, gifts, or bequests. In addition to that it had been thought desirable by most persons who had paid attention to the subject, that the drawings of the original paintings by the old masters, alluded to by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), should be placed in the same building with the original oil paintings, that the two collections should be placed together, not only on account of the immense artistic value of the drawings themselves, but also as illustrating and explaining the oil paintings. It was, he thought, admitted by all the Committees and Royal Commissions who had investigated this subject, that it would be necessary to acquire either the whole or the greater part of the space which was in the rear of the present National Gallery in Trafalgar Square, which was at present occupied by the workhouse, Archbishop Tennyson's library, the schools, some houses on the western side of St. Martin's Place, and the barracks. His impression was that ultimately the whole of that space would be required to make such a gallery as that House and the country ought to be satisfied with. Now, as far as one could judge, the parish of St. Martin was ready to come to an arrangement with the Government relative to the workhouse. They would require that a new workhouse out of the parish should be substituted in lieu of the old one, within a reasonable distance. They would also require a parish office in the parish, a ward for the casual poor, and the library would have to be rebuilt. Then the houses he had alluded to would have to be purchased to complete the area and give a proper frontage on the eastern side. The barracks were considered very important by the military authorities, but they might assume that it would be possible to provide other barracks of equal size in a central and convenient place. The expense of the alteration would be not less than £300,000, which would be required to be spent in obtaining a site of an equal area to that of Burlington House, and consequently that sum would be required to be provided by Parliament in addition to any that would have been required if they had taken Burlington House. Between the cost of building on the two sites there would not be so much difference as to call for special remark, but the site in Trafalgar Square would be the more costly, having more ornamental frontage. If the site of the National Gallery were permanently decided —[“Order, order!”] He thought the House wished him to explain, for if he were not permitted to do so he should have some difficulty in answering the question of the hon. Member for Galway. It was right that the House should consider that if a sufficient National Gallery were to be placed on the Trafalgar Square site, the extent of building required would be reduced by the extent of the existing building. But on the other, if the same accommodation were to be provided elsewhere—at Burlington House for instance—although the building would not be diminished, the cost would be diminished by the amount of £80,000, or any other sum which the Royal Academicians might have to contribute. Under those circumstances he thought the House would not expect that he should be able to state the views of the Government at once upon the point, because those were matters which required great care and consideration. He was unable to say that any notice would be immediately given to the Royal Academy to vacate their part of the building.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether there is any objection to produce the plans prepared by order of the Government by the late Sir Charles Barry, and also those of Mr. Wilkins, showing the plan of the barracks as intended to form galleries in the National Gallery, if the building were ever extended?

MR. COWPER said, he had never seen Sir Charles Barry's plans, and as far as he could learn they never had been sent to the department. The plans of Mr. Wilkins were mentioned before the Committee of 1848. [MR. HENRY SEYMOUR: The Committee of 1836.] But he was quite ignorant whether there was any foundation for the statement alluded to. There was no record of the matter in the Office of Works, and he was totally unable to give any information on the subject.

CHINA—MAJOR GORDON'S APPOINTMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, By whose orders and under what instructions Major Gordon was appointed to the command of the Chinese Disciplined Force now employed in the suppression of the rebellion in China, and empowered to conduct the recent Military operations, having for their object the restoration of Nankin to Imperial rule, inasmuch as Sir Frederick Bruce, in the Inclosure of a Despatch to Earl Russell, dated June 12, 1863, being copy of a Memorandum addressed by him to Prince Kung, on June 5, 1863, stated

“That he, Sir Frederick Bruce, must decline to allow Officers of Her Majesty's Army to take any part in Military operations further than may be necessary for the protection of British interests, and his first step consequently will be to desire that Major Gordon and others serving with him at Shanghai, shall not pass the boundary described as the thirty-mile radius.”

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, he must beg to refer the hon. Gentleman to the blue-books laid on the table of the House on the “Affairs of China,” Nos. 31 to 37, from which it would be seen under what authority Major Gordon took the command of Chinese troops. The authority was given by Brigadier Staveley on condition that Major Gordon should retire on half-pay. And by the Order in Council and other instructions, officers retiring on half-pay were permitted under certain circumstances to take service beyond the thirty mile radius.

MR. LIDDELL: Was that sanctioned by Sir Frederick Bruce?

MR. LAYARD said, he had every reason to believe it was sanctioned by him.

VACCINATION ACT.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether, in accordance with the statement of the Lord President last year, “that the Government were considering the best means of effecting an improvement in the Vaccination Law,” and having regard to the great loss of life from small-pox which has lately occurred in London, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure on that subject in the present Session?

MR. H. A. BRUCE, in reply, said, there could be no doubt that a very large and unnecessary loss of life resulted from neglect of the provisions of the Vaccination Act. The right hon. Gentleman was of course aware that, although the Vaccination Act was obligatory, its successful application depended on the active concurrence of Boards of Guardians, vaccinating surgeons, and parents of the children. Where that was given the operation of the Act had been tolerably successful, but where it was wanting deaths had been frequent. A similar question had been put this year to his noble Friend the President of the Council, who stated that in his opinion there were only two methods by which the disease could be successfully grappled with. One was by increasing the compulsory powers of the Act, the other by offering pecuniary inducements to the vaccinating surgeons. Parliament, his noble Friend thought, would not sanction greater compulsory powers, and he did not see his way to the application of the other alternative. He understood that notice had been given by a noble Lord in the other House of an intention to introduce a Bill on the subject which would be referred to a Select Committee. He hoped that measure would have the effect of strengthening the law and removing the evil now complained of.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

INDIA—CLAIMS OF AZEEM JAH.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he rose to move that "A Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the claims of his Highness Azeem Jah to the title and dignity of the Nawab of the Carnatic, and further to report upon the circumstances under which the Treaty entered into between his Highness's father, Azeem ul Dowlah, and the East India Company, dated the 31st day of July, 1801, has been declared void." Four years ago some papers relating to the case had been laid on the table of the House at his request. Being then a new Member of the House, he did not feel himself competent to carry to a successful issue a question of such magnitude. He, therefore, looked for aid, and communicated with the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard), who, after examination into the matter, was so satisfied that gross injustice had been done, that upon one or two occasions he accompanied him to the India Office and endeavoured to obtain justice. Of course they were unsuccessful. Restitution was a word not known in the vocabulary of the India Office. Since that time, the hon. Gentleman had been appointed Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and he was, therefore, not in a position to support a Motion that might bring into discredit a Department of the Government which he served. Last year the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) brought forward this question. On that occasion the Government had recourse to the usual expedient of counting out the House, and that they succeeded in doing after one or two unsuccessful efforts. He had, therefore, undertaken to bring forward the Motion himself, although he approached the matter with reluctance, painfully sensible of his incapacity to do it justice. He would, however, do his best, and trusted he should receive the indulgent consideration of the House. He approached the subject with regret, because he should have to speak in terms of some asperity of Gentlemen with whom he had for some years been officially associated; but whilst he should call a spade a spade, he should, in speaking of their conduct, "nothing extenuate nor aught set down in malice." He could safely say that, during the whole time of his residence in Madras, he had no communication direct or indirect with the Nawab or his family; and he simply brought forward the Motion, because he believed that the Indian Government had violated the principles of truth and honour, and that the flagitious treatment which the Nawab's family had experienced would long rankle in the minds of the Indian people, to the discredit of this country. He would give a detailed statement of the circumstances of the case, and he hoped he should make the injustice clear to the House, and he should most certainly go to a division upon it. The case of the Princes of the Carnatic was not an isolated one. The history of that family was the history of almost every Prince of India that had had the misfortune to enter into political relations with the Government. When the East India Company was a body of merchants trading in the Carnatic, their obligations to the Royal Family were great, and they were constantly acknowledged; but when the East India Company became a powerful body, the political connection subsisting between the two Powers was looked upon as cumbrous, and the family had been ultimately trampled out in the scandalous manner he should endeavour to demonstrate. Towards the end of the last century, when the East India Company had great power in the Carnatic, the existing engagements based upon the Treaties of 1787 and 1792 were considered by the Governor General of that period complicated, and no doubt they were inconvenient, because they involved the necessity of a double government, the districts of the Carnatic being administered partly by the officers of the Company and partly by those of the Nawab. To get rid of the double government strong pressure was, therefore, brought to bear on the Nawab at the commencement of the present century in order to induce him to cede the civil and military administration of his dominions to the East India Company for a payment in cash; but that Prince would not listen to any cajolery of the diplomatists, and then threats of deposition were had recourse to. The threats of deposition were founded on the allegation that from the archives of Mysore he was known to have been engaged in a treacherous correspondence against the Company. But all in vain. The Nawab Omdut ool Omrah died in 1801, leaving behind him a son, of whose illegitimacy no doubt was ever entertained. The Marquess of Wellesley was then Governor General, a man of great ability and not very scrupulous. The Marquess at once proposed to acknowledge this illegitimate son as heir to an hereditary monarchy upon one condition. He said that no inquiry should be made into the young man's birth, provided he would make the concession demanded with respect to the civil and military administration. Unexpectedly, however, Houssein Ali, the illegitimate son, not being made of very squeezable materials, positively refused. Upon that the Marquess full of expedients took quite the opposite course—he declared the throne of the Carnatic to be vacant on the ground of a disputed succession. He did more than that, in all the public and semi-official correspondence of the period he proclaimed his belief that he might then have lawfully seized on the Carnatic and held it by force, and he would have justified such a proceeding on the grounds of the treacherous correspondence which he affected to have discovered in the archives of Mysore. But he declared he would not act upon those grounds, and for this reason, that if he did, a strong impression would be created, that lust of power and a desire for territorial aggrandizement are the principles of our rule in India. The Marquess of Wellesley therefore instructed Lord Clive, the ancestor of the present Earl of Powis, his lieutenant at Madras, that he should acknowledge as heir to the Carnatic, Prince Azeem ul Dowlah, the first cousin of the late Prince, the real heir, with whom was made the Treaty of 1801, which existed for fifty-six years, and then was disgracefully violated. That treaty set forth in the preamble that security had not been obtained for British interests in the Carnatic, that therefore a new treaty was necessary to correct the defects of the Treaties of 1787 and 1792; and to place the relations between the two parties upon a permanent basis of security. It spoke of drawing closer the ties of amity heretofore existing, so that they might endure for ever. The main object of the treaty was stated to be to settle the succession as against the reputed son, and to that end the Prince Azeem ul Dowlah was declared to be established in the rank and dignity of the Nawab of the Carnatic, with the consent of the East India Company. The Prince so acknowledged ceded in perpetuity the civil and military administration of the Carnatic to the British Government. The East India Company undertook on their part that the Nawab and his heirs should preserve his title and dignity, and agreed to pay to him one-fifth of the net revenues after defraying all the expenses, with the proviso that the amount should not fall short of £100,000 per annum. It was also stipulated that such portions of the former treaties as were not expressly repealed by that of 1801 should remain in full force. The treaty was signed by Lord Clive on the one part, and by the Nawab on the other, and it was ratified by the Marquess of Wellesley. As soon as the treaty was ratified, a proclamation was issued and sent to all the Native Courts in India, announcing the nature of the arrangements that had been made. The Prince thus acknowledged died in 1819. The fact was immediately announced to the Madras Government, and that Government, in communicating the event to the Supreme Government at Calcutta, inquired whether it considered the treaty a permanent one, whether it guaranteed the succession in the direct line of descent, and whether some modification of the treaty might not be advisable. The Marquess of Hastings, then Governor General, and a man of the highest honour and integrity—and he wished they had some of the same cast now—replied that it was not necessary to require the surviving Princes of the Nawab's family to acknowledge their adherence to the treaty, because ipso facto they were parties to it already; that the treaty was permanent and not temporary, and that there was no necessity for making the slightest modification in it. It was now alleged that the treaty expired in 1819, and that it was a temporary one. But would such an answer have been made by the Marquess of Hastings, if the treaty had been merely a personal one, and not permanent? Such a supposition was too preposterous to merit refutation. As soon as the reply of the Marquess of Hastings was received, the Madras Government installed the eldest son in the Musnud, and a ceremony equivalent to our coronation was performed. General Abercrombie, then holding the reins of government at Madras, attended and made a speech, in which he congratulated the Nawab on ascending the throne in the direct line of hereditary succession, and informed him that the Treaty of 1801 was held by the Governor General to be as equally binding upon the sons as it was on their late father Azeem ul Dowlah. In 1825 the second Nawab died, in the prime of life, leaving one child. Sir Thomas Munro, then Governor of Madras, at once acknowledged that child as the Nawab, but as he was an infant in arms, the next brother of the deceased Nawab was acknowledged by Sir Thomas Munro Regent and heir apparent, and as such he was received with regal honours at the Government House. The Regent addressed a letter to George IV., who responded, congratulating him on his elevation, and hoping "that the splendour and dignity, which are the inheritance of the illustrious house of the Carnatic, might long continue." The man thus congratulated was now a beggar. The Regent also wrote to the Court of Directors, and they too replied, expressing their gratification at the succession, and concluding with these words—

"We pray God"—he never knew that they prayed, but it seemed they did in 1828—"we pray God that the young Nawab may long live to enjoy the honours and perpetuate the line of the ancient and illustrious family of which he is the heir."

That devout prayer was not fulfilled. Indeed they themselves prevented its fulfilment, for they suppressed his dignity. The child who was thus acknowledged in 1825, was permitted to grow up in perfect ignorance. Successive Governments took no care to see that he was educated; and he had a minute in his hand in which Lord Harris justified his being kept in ignorance on the ground that if he had been educated he would have been discontented. That was the opinion of a liberal lord. He was happy to say it was not his. The successive Governments of Madras did more than this—they permitted and connived at the plunder of this young Prince. They allowed his revenues to be made away with, although they had a resident at his court, which was not a quarter of a mile from the Government House. No pains were taken to see that his revenues were properly appropriated; the consequence was that the Nawab's property was, he believed, largely dissipated by the ladies of his family, and hon. Members knew what ladies would do in that way, if they were not placed under control. Many European gentlemen were also allowed to sell him property at three times its value, and that was allowed to go to wreck and ruin. Under these circumstances, when the young Nawab came of age, instead of being in the possession of a considerable fortune, he found himself overwhelmed with debt, and his imppecuniosity embittered and shortened his existence. Yet the Government that had permitted this state of things charged the family with such improvidence as justified their suppression. The Nawab died at the end of 1855, and did not leave behind him the numerous progeny for which the Court of Directors had put up their prayers. His decease was reported by the Regent to the Government, and he requested to be acknowledged as the Nawab's successor, and to receive the sums that had been paid through the Treasury and were guaranteed by the treaty. To this application no answer had ever been returned. The Governor of Madras had received the Regent with regal honours, yet he now treated him as though he had been a base and impudent impecator. But although the authorities gave him no answer they were not idle. Within ten days of the death of the Nawab the Governor and his Council—Mr. W. Elliott and Sir H. Montgomery, now of the Indian Office—put on record a minute embodying every objection that ingenuity could suggest to the treaty. Now to this Minute he (Mr. Smollett) must advert at length for two reasons, first because the reasons contained in that minute were endorsed by Mr. Vernon Smith then the President of the Board of Control, now Lord Lyveden, and to him he attributed the greatest share of the blame in the matter. Others were responsible—the Court of Directors, for example, and Lord Dalhousie—but they were both defunct. Secondly, he must advert to this document because it was a minute which for hardihood and recklessness of official statement exceeded anything he had ever heard of. It began by admitting that the uncle was heir to the nephew just deceased, and that if the treaty were worth a rush, he must have obtained the same privileges and received the same income as his nephew. But the minute then proceeded to show how the whole engagements of the treaty might be safely if not honourably dispensed with. The Governor started with the astounding assertion that the treaty bore on its very face the character of being a personal treaty, made with the late Azeem ul Dowlah, for a temporary purpose. In the minute, the temporary purpose was not very clearly designated, but he assumed that what the Company wanted in framing this treaty was a title deed, by which at a future time they might cheat and swindle the family out of their inheritance. Lord Harris admitted that there was an obstacle in the way of construing this treaty as a personal engagement—namely, that in the preamble the terms “perpetual” and “permanent” were used; he also admitted that the treaty was described as one that was to “endure for all time to come” and “for evermore,” the terms being more than once repeated. But the noble Lord was very adroit in his argument. He construed “perpetual” to mean “temporary,” and contended that “for evermore” and “for all time” meant “during the life of the prince.” In this way, and this construction of the word admitted, the argument of Lord Harris was quite serene. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh; but the fact was so. Did any one ever hear such an argument? Did any one ever hear such an argument even from a lordling? even from a Lord Tomnoddy? He presumed that many hon. Members had seen that amusing piece at the Haymarket, Our American Cousin. The hero of the piece was a lord who was such an idiot that he could not count his fingers; but even Lord Dundreary, he believed, would be ashamed to contend that “perpetual” meant “temporary,” and that the expression “for all time to come” meant “for the life of himself and his brother Sam.” Lord Harris then went on to admit that one main object of the treaty was to settle the succession. But “settling a succession,” in the Madras vocabulary, meant the suppression of a dynasty, and the noble Lord and his council “settled the succession” of the unfortunate Nawab with a vengeance. The noble Lord went on to speak of the “well-known sentiments of the Marquess of Wellesley;” and he quoted sundry small sentences from long despatches written by the Marquess of Wellesley to Mr. Dundas, afterwards first Viscount Melville. In those sentences the Marquess of Wellesley certainly said he thought that at the time—in 1800—he would have been justified in seizing and confiscating the Carnatic, on account of the traitorous correspondence, in which he seemed to put implicit credence, though no one else did. But what did this prove? Why, nothing at all; for Lord Harris forgot to add that although that was the Marquess of Wellesley’s opinion he did not act upon it. But still further, if it were really desired to know what Lord Wellesley proposed to effect by this treaty, if his actual intentions were not apparent in the words of the document itself, he (Mr. Smollett) was fortunately enabled to prove them by the evidence of the greatest subject Her Majesty ever had, he meant by the late Duke of Wellington. In the earlier part of his career the Duke of Wellington, then Colonel Wellesley, was secretary to his brother, the Marquess of Wellesley, at Calcutta. In that capacity he had access to the cabinet of the Marquess, and was acquainted with the motives for all the great measures of his policy, and was also well aware of every fact connected with them. It chanced that the Duke of Wellington, having returned to this country in the earlier part of the century, was solicited by the Board of Control to write an official account of his brother’s brilliant career, who had been impeached in the House of Commons by a Mr. Paul, a tailor of Calcutta, who afterwards aspired to be a metropolitan representative, and stood for the City of Westminster. Well, what did the Duke of Wellington write in that memorandum? It should be remembered that it was submitted to the Board of Control and the Court of Directors, that the blanks were filled up by those functionaries, and that it was now a State document in the office of the India Board. What said the Duke of Wellington in that memorandum? He told the story of his brother's great achievements in Madras ; he adverted to the decease of Omdut ool Omrah ; he referred to the supercession of the reputed son Hoosein Ali ; he described the investiture of Azeem ul Dowlah ; and then he concluded—

"The Prince Azeem ul Dowlah having agreed to an arrangement with Lord Clive, a treaty was concluded by which the whole of the civil and military government of the Carnatic was transferred for ever to the East India Company, with a condition that Prince Azeem ul Dowlah and his heirs were to preserve their titles and dignities, and receive one-fifth part of the net revenues of the country."

The Duke of Wellington then asserted that his brother, Lord Wellesley, by this treaty, confirmed the right, title, and dignity, and one-fifth of the revenue, to Azeem ul Dowlah and his heirs. Now, who were his heirs? Two of his sons were still alive; the last Regent was his second son, and there were yet two sons who had not "shuffled off the mortal coil." Without waiting for that event, however, they had been basely and scandalously disinherited. One object which he (Mr. Smollett) had in view in quoting from that memorandum of the Duke of Wellington was to rescue the memory of the Marquess of Wellesley, who with all his failings was a great statesman, from the foul assertion that he purposely made the treaty of 1801 vague and ambiguous in order to aid in the plunder of the family at a future period. The Governor of Madras, Lord Harris, asserted that all this guarantee of succession was false, that the treaty was a personal treaty, that it was purposely ambiguous. But the Duke of Wellington wrote when the events were fresh in his mind ; he had no ulterior object to serve ; the narrative was acknowledged and sanctioned by the Board of Control and the Court of Directors. But, besides all this, the Duke of Wellington was incapable of falsehood ; and that was more than could be asserted of some other men. He trusted, therefore, that the House would believe the statement of the Duke of Wellington, and treat with contempt the assertion of the Governor of Madras and his satellites, that the treaty was made to expire in 1819 ; that it had never been renewed ; that it was mere waste paper. He repeated that these Madras assertions were untrue, they were concocted more than half a century after the events, and they were framed to carry out a foregone conclusion, and to bolster up a scheme of robbery and spoliation which was then rife in India. The

Madras Minute went on to speak of the two successions in 1819 and 1825, and Lord Harris admitted that these were very stubborn facts ; but he added that no argument as to the duration of the treaty could be drawn from those two successions, because on both occasions the authorities of Madras made use of language which showed that the treaty was conceived to be at an end, and was not worth a rush. That assertion was untrue. It was untrue that such opinions were ever given by the Governor of Madras, and certainly an idea of this sort was never expressed by Sir Thomas Monro. Unfortunately for the accuracy of the Madras narrative, Sir Thomas Monro wrote a minute about the treaty in 1822, three years after the death of Azeem ul Dowlah, and three years, therefore, after the treaty, according to the Governor of Madras, had expired. That minute was not on the question of succession, for no lapse in the succession had then been anticipated. It was written in the case of one of the first gentlemen of the Carnatic, by name Kullum Oollah Khan, who had become entangled in a lawsuit in the Supreme Court of Madras. It appeared to Sir Thomas Monro that the action of the Supreme Court of Madras in this nobleman's case, trenched on the prerogatives of the Nawab as a sovereign prince. He appealed to England, and the decision of the Supreme Court was reversed. On that occasion Sir Thomas Monro went into a complete inquiry, the time being three years after the period when, according to the Governor of Madras, the treaty had expired, and declared the treaty to be valid and in full force, the Nawab and his family to be sovereign princes, and he insisted that not one of the provisions of the treaty could be changed without the consent of the Nawab and his family. Yet, with this document before him, another Governor, twenty-five years afterwards, boldly declared that the treaty expired in 1819, and was never renewed, and was mere waste paper, insolently quoting Sir Thomas Monro's dictum in support of his declaration! The boldness, the audacity, and effrontery of such an assertion was really almost beyond belief. The Governor of Madras having then, to his own entire satisfaction, shown that the treaty was a personal one, that it had terminated in 1819, and was never renewed, proceeded to speak of the treaty as if it were a perpetual one ; and he argued that, according to the authority of

Vattel and another great writer Wheaton, even if it had been intended to be perpetual it was void by reason of containing immoral conditions. These writers, the Governor urged, had held that treaties containing immoral conditions were voidable. The argument went over thirty paragraphs of the minute; but he would endeavour to condense it into a syllogism. Treaties containing immoral conditions were voidable; now, that Treaty of 1801 contained a provision that was immoral; therefore it was void. Voidable would be the logical conclusion; but logic was not much studied in Madras. The noble Lord got still wilder as he advanced. In paragraph 38 of Lord Harris's minute, his Lordship said, and the language was terse and epigrammatic, "I wonder that any one can think this is a treaty at all." That was a very insolent assertion even for a nobleman to make. It was very insolent to speak thus of a treaty framed by Lord Clive, and ratified by the Marquess of Wellesley, men both immeasurably his superiors, and acknowledged by the successive Governments of various monarchs of Great Britain. But how did the noble Lord make out that this treaty contained immoral provisions? In this way. He said, "If the treaty is permanent it contains a provision for a perpetual annuity. Now, a perpetual annuity is a nuisance." Well, so perhaps the Chancellor of the Exchequer might deem the payment of the National Debt. "But if the annuities were paid to a black prince it would be a dangerous nuisance." No danger, however, his Lordship admitted, had happened during the last sixty years. Nevertheless, a nuisance might arise from paying the annuity in future, and nuisances ought to be abated, therefore the treaty was void." That was the argument. It was upon that pretence, which was too pettifogging for even an Old Bailey lawyer to address to a Middlesex jury; it was on the pretence that it was inconvenient to pay just debts that the Government was asked to put an end to a treaty and declare it to be null and void. And what was the treaty they would declare to be null and void? Why, it was the single title deed by which the British Government held the Carnatic. The noble Lord seemed to have forgotten that that treaty was the single title deed of his Government for the possession of that country, and that title deed he declared void. And what was the Carna-

tic? A country worth £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 a year, the possession of which, that treaty being annulled, was nothing but a usurpation. The noble Viscount at the head of Her Majesty's Government often spoke of treaty rights, and their sacred nature. He said we had a treaty with China, and we must compel the barbarians to observe it; we had a treaty with the Japanese, and we must compel them to respect it. He wished the noble Viscount would compel his Colleagues to pay some respect to treaties with the Native Princes of India, which they had violated on the most false and frivolous prettexts. But towards the end of that precious minute the Governor and his Council argued as follows:—"After all, it would be a good thing to acknowledge this poor old fellow, for he is very old, and cannot long subsist on our bounty; and if the payment of this subsidy expired on his demise, I should have little hesitation in recommending this act of justice; but there is an obstacle in the way." And what did the House think the obstacle was? "He, the quondam Regent, has got brothers; his brothers are sons of Azeem ul Dowlah, with whom the treaty was made; they have equal rights with himself, and they have children. If, therefore, we recognize this man, there will be no end to the payments of this annuity, at least in our own time." It seemed, therefore, to the Governor that the best thing they could do was to put a bold face on the matter, and once for all declare the treaty at an end. Unfortunately the Government was nothing loth to act on that advice, and thus a family was allowed to be trampled upon, who, of all the Royal Princes in India, had manifested the greatest devotion to the East India Company, giving them various grants of land, and ceding a valuable kingdom without the shedding of a single drop of blood. He would not go farther into this miserable minute. From beginning to end it did not contain one word of truth or honest statement. It was not true that the treaty of 1801 came to an end in 1819, and was never renewed. The Governor who asserted that knew right well that it was not renewed, because the Marquess of Hastings declared it to be permanent and did not require renewal. It was not true to state that Sir Thomas Munro said it ended in 1819, for in 1822 he declared it to be still in full force. It was not true that the family had been regarded as pensioners since 1819. The very reverse was the fact, for they were ever treated as Royal Princes. An instance had come under his own cognizance. In the government of Sir H. Pottinger, a civil servant in high office was charged with having had pecuniary dealings with the Nawab, and was brought to trial for it, under the Act which declared any pecuniary transactions on the part of members of the service with Native sovereign Princes a misdemeanor. He put it to the House whether he had not fully justified his description of this minute as surpassing in hardihood of official assertion and recklessness of misstatement any state paper ever penned? One word with regard to the Motion with which he should conclude. The Motion was for a Committee to inquire, and he thought he had shown ample grounds for an inquiry. The Motion was so reasonable that he really could not see what answer could be made to it. He had often spoken of the Prince's treatment to gentlemen out of the House, and some had said he was a d—d nigger, and ought to be plundered. [Laughter.] That was no laughing matter in his opinion; he could mention the names of these gentlemen—gentlemen of high position. Others had said, "Oh, why should you fall foul of the authorities about these things? They did not benefit personally by the Act." He hoped that no such defence would be put forward in that House. The question was in a nutshell. He had heard people of honourable station say, "Well, there would be an imperium in imperio at Madras if the Nawab were restored. It was a bad thing for a man so circumstanced to be receiving £100,000 a year, and it was desirable that an end should be put to it." But the Prince did not receive £100,000 a year. He admitted that that would be a large sum for an individual to receive; but the £100,000 went to maintain ten or twelve families living apart. But was there no such imperium in imperio in England as a subject of Her Majesty with £100,000 a year? The question, as he had said, lay in a nutshell. It did not involve the transfer of a kingdom, nor the transfer of a single inch of soil from Her Majesty to any one else. The simple question was, should or should not a pecuniary engagement entered into in 1801, and observed for fifty-six years, be carried out? Should an engagement to which the faith and honour of England were pledged be persevered with? Or should the honour of England be trampled in the dirt? That was the question. He would assume that the men of whom he complained were honourable men in private life. He would admit that they were. Still, they were charged with a grave political misdemeanor by men whose honour was as unassailable as their own. They were charged with setting aside a treaty on the most frivolous pretence, calling for that purpose "permanent," "temporary," and "for ever and all time coming" the uncertain duration of one man's life—were it a day, or a year, or twenty years. How ought charges of that nature to be met? They ought to be met by inquiry. An honest man, conscious of his own integrity, would naturally say, "Sir, I deny the charge; I stand upon my honour, and claim inquiry; I assert that in the matters in question I was actuated by the best motives; if there has been mischief it has been done unwittingly, if errors or injustice have been committed let them now be rectified. I will not stand on the support of my superiors alone, for my employers benefited by the judgment in this case, and were therefore interested in the decision. I therefore demand a full and fair inquiry, and shall be satisfied with nothing less." That was the language which an honest man would use in such a position, unless there was something behind which would not bear investigation. That also, he hoped, would be the language which would that evening be held by the Secretary of State for India for his own sake, and for the sake of those other gentlemen who were connected with the transaction, and whom he should be glad to see purged from the accusations which he had brought against them, for he bore them no malice. But if the right hon. Baronet took a different line, if with that lofty eloquence for which he was renowned he endeavoured to throw dust in the eyes of the House, or if with that sophistry which Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench so aptly used he should endeavour to elude inquiry, then he hoped the independence of the House of Commons would come to his aid and compel the Government to institute an investigation into the dark and iniquitous transactions to which he had called attention—words which he would not use did he not believe them to be fully deserved.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

"a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the claims of his Highness Azeem Jah to the title and dignity of the Nawab of the Carnatic; and further to report upon the circumstances under which the Treaty entered into between his Highness's father, Azeem ul Dowlah and the East India Company, dated the 31st day of July, 1801, has been declared void;"—(Mr. Smollett),

—instead thereof.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. H. R. GRENFELL said, that having examined the different Motions which had been submitted to the House on the subject, he found that the Motion of the hon. Gentleman opposite differed from that of the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) which was discussed last year; and he thought the hon. Gentleman had acted wisely in taking that course. The Motion proposed last year prayed for an inquiry, not merely into the claims of Azeem Jah, but into the circumstances which led to the Treaty of 1801. But this year the Motion was for an inquiry into the circumstances which led to the breach of that treaty. The Motion this year was more prudent than the speech with which it was introduced, for he could not conceive any circumstances more telling against the claims of Azeem Jah than an investigation into the events which led to the treaty. It was clear to him that Azeem Jah had not suffered either in his position or from any wrongs inflicted by the Government. His father Azeem ul Dowlah was removed from that unfortunate position which the uncles and younger brothers of a Prince on the Musnud usually occupied in Mahomedan sovereignties, and was placed in the enjoyment of the throne of the Carnatic. He was placed on the mock throne of the Carnatic, and but for that he would probably have passed his life in prison, and if his son and grandson had succeeded him it was very probable Azeem Jah would have spent his life in prison. Therefore he maintained that so far from Azeem Jah having suffered wrong he had enjoyed the protection of the British Government, and had thus been enabled to use, or misuse, as might be, the privileges which accompanied his high rank and position. He would not, he might add, follow the hon. Gentleman into the observations which he had made with respect to the Minute of Lord Harris, to which he had called attention. It would be the duty of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India to defend Lord Harris, but he might be permitted to say that it was the duty of Lord Harris to inquire into the details of the question in order that he might be able to lay before the Government at home all that was said on both sides. An examination of the minute would moreover, he thought, clearly show that the very existence of mock thrones, such as that of the Carnatic, was the infliction of a wrong on the public, while they were of very little advantage to those by whom they were occupied. He wished to submit to the House some considerations with respect to the Motion under their consideration, and the consequences which must follow its adoption. If it should be adopted it would be tantamount to an assertion on the part of the House, that Azeem Jah had suffered some wrong at the hands of the British Government, thus reversing the opinions of some of the greatest statesmen who had ever lived, and whose views had been formed under all the weight of the responsible positions which they held. If the House granted a Committee it would virtually give an instruction to the Committee to afford some remedy for the wrongs which it was supposed Azeem Jah had suffered. They must either recommend his restoration to the throne, or make him some larger pecuniary recompense than he now received. Now he thought the House would pause before taking any such step, for he maintained that to justify such a step it should be shown either that a private wrong had been sustained, or that the remedy would effect a public benefit, or that the letter of the treaty had been broken. He had already shown that Azeem Jah had suffered no wrong, and he believed that an examination into the matter would show that the existence of these mock thrones was against public policy and a wrong towards the people. Then, supposing the Committee should decline giving any recommendation with regard to the throne, the second alternative was the recommendation of a larger money grant. He did not see any ground for an additional money grant. It appeared that Azeem Jah had not accepted the terms of the Government. But although he had not done so, he actually drew the sum of money allowed him.

MR. SMOLLETT: Certainly not.

MR. H. R. GRENFELL: The greatest part of it.

MR. SMOLLETT: Not a penny of it. He never accepted a part.

MR. H. R. GRENFELL said, that he did not say that he accepted the grant, but that he had drawn the money. Now, with regard to the recommendation of a larger money grant from the Indian revenue, it was clear the House had a right to withdraw its confidence from any Government which did not do its utmost to procure such a grant from the Indian Council; but, for his own part, he thought it would be unfortunate that that House should be placed in opposition to the Indian Council as well as to other Indian authorities. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh, but there might come a time when they would have to consider whether the Indian debt should be charged upon the Imperial Exchequer, and the making of grants out of the Indian revenue would deprive them of one of their best arguments for keeping the two Exchequers separate. There only remained the letter of the treaty. And what were the authorities quoted by the hon. Member against the formidable array of statesmen who agree in their opinions. A stray memorandum of the Duke of Wellington, who was not a party to these transactions. The correspondence of Lord Clive and Lord Wellesley, who were officially charged with these matters, showed that they did not consider the treaty permanent, or the mock throne hereditary.

MR. SMOLLETT: The memorandum was acknowledged by the Board of Control and the Board of Directors.

MR. H. R. GRENFELL: No doubt the memorandum existed; but it was not made official with the responsibility which would have attached if the Duke of Wellington had been a party to the transaction. For these reasons he opposed the Motion. The position which the present Government of India occupied towards that which had preceded it greatly resembled the position occupied by Lords Cornwallis and Canning towards the Marquess of Wellesley and Lord Dalhousie. Those noble Lords went out with the express intention of adopting a more conciliatory policy than had been pursued by their predecessors, but they did not give up the conquests which had been made, or the provinces which had been annexed by them. So ought the Crown to act now that it had assumed the government of India. It ought not to abandon any of the provinces which were subject to its sway, or shrink from the responsibilities incurred, but to do all that was possible to conciliate the Princes who remained, and the people who paid to it so vast a revenue.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that his hon. Friend near him (Mr. Smollett) had established some claim on the consideration of the House, which on a former occasion the subject had not deserved, because he had confined his remarks to the merits of the particular case, and had not launched out as had been done before into general invectives against the policy of the Indian administration; and although he had made use of some expressions of unusual force the House had a tangible case to deal with. As his hon. Friend had truly remarked, the gist of the case lay in a very small compass. It was well known that Lord Mornington on arriving in India found that among the other great questions that were awaiting his decision the condition of the Carnatic called for his early interference. The Mahomedan Government which had been established under the Emperor of Delhi had fallen into a state of the greatest anarchy, and that the greatest distress and misery was felt by the people. Of all the evil acts which existed none were more manifest than those which arose out of the ambiguous sovereignty exercised partly by the East India Company and partly by the Nawabs. The treaty then in force was the Treaty of 1792, which was an extension and emendation of the Treaty of 1787. By that treaty it was stipulated that in consideration of the enjoyment of four-fifths of the revenue of the Carnatic, the Company should guarantee the stability of the throne of the Nawab, and maintain peace in his province. In fact, it amounted to an offensive and defensive alliance between the Company and the Nawab. Lord Wellesley found that the payments of revenue to the Company were no less than sixty-six lacs in arrear; and that although the Government of India was combating an enormous Power both in India and in Europe, these Princes, instead of assisting them, as by treaty they were bound to do, were throwing every possible obstacle in their way. The real point upon which this question turned was the Treaty of 1801. [Mr. SMOLLETT: Hear, hear!] He was glad that his hon. Friend admitted that. After Lord Wellesley had, by the valour of British troops and his own firmness, gained the victory of Seringapatam, he brought under the notice of the Government of Madras the conduct of the Nawab of the Carnatic to the British Government. He wrote to Lord Clive stating that the capture of Seringapatam had brought to light the existence of a secret correspondence of a most hostile nature to the British power, in which Tippoo Sahib was implicated, and that the late Nawab was guilty of a flagrant violation of the Treaty of 1792. His failure to furnish the British troops with the supplies which he had covenanted to do, together with other proofs of his treachery, were recapitulated. The papers upon which these charges were founded were examined by a Commission appointed by the Government of India, a principal member of which was the Secretary of the Government of Madras; and, after a most careful examination, proofs were afforded of the treachery of which the parties implicated had been guilty. It was proved that in defiance of the Treaty of 1792 the Nawab of the Carnatic had been in constant communication with Tippoo Sultan, giving him secret information with regard to the intentions of the British Government towards the French, and as to the best means of rendering nugatory those preparations which were being made in reference to the war, that very nearly proved fatal to our empire in India. Year by year, down to 1797, Tippoo Sultan received most useful information from the Nawabs of the Carnatic, who, when the war actually broke out, threw obstacles in the way of the British Government receiving the supplies so necessary to carry on the war successfully. [Mr. SMOLLETT: That has nothing to do with the treaty.] He begged his hon. Friend's pardon, it had a great deal to do with the treaty. He could quote page after page from the most competent authorities in India, from Sir J. Outram, Mr. Elphinstone, Lord Wellesley, and Lord Clive, all of whom pointed out that the Treaty of 1792 had been violated to the most flagrant degree by the Nawabs of the Carnatic. He now came to the Treaty of 1801, on which his hon. Friend had laid so much stress. What was the foundation of that treaty? His hon. Friend the Member for Dumbartonshire said its chief intention was to confirm the succession of the Nawabs. Now, its chief intention was to place the affairs of the Carnatic upon a more satisfactory footing; and the first most necessary measure to be carried into effect was, to place the whole of the civil and military force of the Carnatic in the hands of the East India Company. Lord Wellesley said he had to do with a tabula rasa, because the Government had a right to declare the establishment of the Nawab at an end. His hon. Friend talked of this as an ancient sovereignty of India being swept away by British power; but let him remind him that the very father of Mahomed Ali was established in the government of the Carnatic by the British Government ten years before he was recognized by the Emperor of Delhi. The Nawabs were, in the first place, the deputies of the Nizam, who was in turn the deputy of the Emperor of Delhi, and it was not until the British Government, with its growing power, established them in their rule that they were acknowledged as independent Princes. And that was the ancient sovereignty that his hon. Friend—[Mr. SMOLLETT: George IV. said so]—said had been swept away! Lord Wellesley pointed out that it was not desirable in the troubled state of affairs in India at the close of the great war with Tippoo, that a great Mahomedan family should be altogether extinguished, and that what should be done should be done in such a manner as to be honourable to the family and not dangerous to the empire. Well, the Treaty of 1801 was drawn by Lord Clive and forwarded by him to Lord Wellesley, at Calcutta, for approval. The treaty was approved of, but for fear that there should creep into it anything that the Government did not design to continue, he forwarded with it another treaty to be placed before the Nawab for his acceptance. The Nawab accepted them unreservedly. Now, by the Treaty of 1792, we recognized the Nawab and the right of his heirs and successors to the government of that country. But in the Treaty of 1801, on the contrary, there was no mention of heirs and successors; and whereas in the original draft there had been a reference to hereditary right, Lord Wellesley expressly substituted the term "by the grace and favour of the East India Company." If it was possible for a man to shut the door upon such a claim as this, it was done by Lord Wellesley, and done designedly, as might be seen by the correspondence between Lord Wellesley and Lord Clive. In 1819 and 1825 the successors of the deceased Nawabs had been appointed; but it was not true that they had succeeded upon any claim of hereditary right, because when it was proposed to the Central Government that such successor should be placed on the throne at the death of the Nawab, the succession was conferred as "an act of grace and favour." In 1855 the matter was considered and determined by one who, if living, would have been the last to disclaim any responsibility that he had incurred. Both Lord Wellesley and Lord Dalhousie were men who stood far too high to be affected by the abuse of his hon. Friend, or by any defence that he (Sir James Ferguson) could make for them. The grounds upon which they had proceeded were on the table of the House. Indeed there was no public question more completely ventilated, for the most important papers had been before the House for sixty years. A Committee, if it were appointed, could not elucidate any fresh evidence; but the House by assenting to the Motion might draw an indictment against public servants who had done their duty to their country, and who had gone to their graves. It might revive, too, claims from one end of India to the other which had long ago been settled. He trusted that the House would not act thus towards public servants of the Crown who had raised the reputation of this country higher than it had ever stood before, but would sustain them in their high and difficult position. He hoped that the House would determine that the question should not be re-opened by arguments contrary to reason and recorded facts; that it would not revive a question settled sixty years ago, and that it would not so administer as to unsettle the affairs of that distant country which Providence had committed to our care.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, that his hon. and gallant Friend who had just sat down had laboured to make unintelligible what, in fact, was a very simple question. His hon. Friend the Member for Dumbartonshire complained that a treaty made with a Native Prince had been violated. Her Majesty, on assuming the direct administration of the Government of India, issued a solemn proclamation stating that all the treaties made by the East India Company with Indian Princes should be faithfully and scrupulously maintained. The question, therefore, before the House involved the honour of the Crown, and was one in which the House was deeply interested. What was the view taken of the treaty by the East India Company when it was first signed? Immediately after the signature of the treaty the Government of India published a proclamation addressed to all the great Chiefs and high Officers of the Carnatic, warning them to pay due allegiance and obedience to the East India Company, which was about to assume the government of that country by virtue of a compact made with the lawful Sovereign of the Carnatic. There were, as the House would perceive, two important admissions in that proclamation—first, that the Nawab was the legitimate Sovereign of the Carnatic; and next, that the Company had acquired their rights to govern the Carnatic solely by virtue of the treaty referred to in the proclamation. What he wanted to know was—and he trusted the Law Officers of the Crown would answer the question—by what right or title we governed the Carnatic at the present time if that treaty had ceased to exist? We could not claim to govern the Carnatic by conquest, for it had never been conquered. We could not say that we governed the country by virtue of a treaty which had ceased to exist. We could not say that part of that treaty had ceased to exist, and a part remained in force, because that would be absurd. But what was it practically that the Government maintained? The Government maintained that that part of the treaty which gave us the right to govern the Carnatic remained in full force, while that portion of the treaty which assigned an income of £120,000 a year to the Nawab had ceased to exist. That was really the argument which might be suited to the old East India Company, but not to the British House of Commons. Under the treaty the Company stipulated to pay a sum equal to one-fifth of the revenues of the Carnatic, or £120,000 a year, to the Nawab for the maintenance of his dignity, and that sum was regularly, honourably, and honestly paid by the East India Company for a period of fifty-four years. In the year 1855 the Marquess of Dalhousie announced that the money should be no longer paid, on the ground that the guarantee, being a personal one, had ceased to exist in 1819, and that the payments made to the Nawab's descendants from that time until 1855 were made as matters of grace and favour by the East India Company. He knew something of that Company and their mode of conducting affairs, and he was persuaded that they never did pay and never would have paid £120,000 a year to any Nawab in India as a matter of grace and favour. The fact was that in 1819, as soon as the former Nawab died, the whole subject was taken into consideration, some fears being entertained that his successor might demand to assume the government of the country. The Madras Government suggested that a distinct treaty should be entered into with the new Prince, but the Supreme Government thought that a continuance to the Nawab of the benefits enjoyed by his deceased father, and an adhesion on his part to the existing treaty, would be preferable to new and precise stipulations. Accordingly, the Governor General was authorized by the Council at Calcutta to make a formal declaration to the Nawab, binding him to the treaty signed by his father, and such a declaration was made by Lord Hastings. It really required more than ordinary impudence to declare in 1855 that a treaty ceased to exist in 1819, when in that very year the Governor General bound the Nawab to the observance of that identical treaty. He knew that in the Madras Government, as in the Government of India, there was a party anxious to continue what was called the annexation policy, and strong enough to prevent the order sent out by his noble Friend when Secretary of State for India, to restore the Principality of Dhar, from being obeyed. That, however, was a direct disobedience of orders, which would have to come before the House. His right hon. Friend, now Secretary of State for India, asked, on the occasion when this subject was last before the House, why the Earl of Derby's Government had not taken up the question. The reason was obvious; the question never came before the Earl of Derby's Government. During the whole time the Earl of Derby's Government were in office the great rebellion was in progress, and when they had subdued the outbreak which former Governments by their misconduct had provoked, the Nawab naturally did not think the time a favourable one to bring forward his case. He waited till the proclamation was issued by Her Majesty's Government promising that all treaties made with Indian Princes should be maintained, and then he addressed his memorial to Government. When it arrived the right hon. Gentleman opposite was Secretary of State for India. [Sir CHARLES WOOD: It arrived in the year 1858.] The first that Parliament heard of the matter was when the hon. Gentleman now Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, at that time an independent Member, asked the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary of State for India, whether it was intended to revise the case of the Nawab of the Carnatic? The right hon. Gentleman might have answered that it was impossible for him to revise all the acts of the East India Company, and so have declined to enter into the question at all; but, on the contrary, he said that he was prepared to revise the case. He did revise the case, and re-decided it as it had already been decided by the Marquess of Dalhousie. It was the decision of the right hon. Gentleman and not that of the Marquess of Dalhousie, which was now complained of. Last year the right hon. Gentleman said that the Marquess of Dalhousie and Lord Harris both laid down that it would not be sound policy to pay down this large sum to a Native Indian Prince to enable him to maintain a rival court within a few miles of Madras, which, like that of Delhi, might become a focus of intrigue against the Government. If it were simply a question of policy he should be disposed to agree with that doctrine, but the question was one of justice and of the faithful observance of treaties; it was a question whether we were to stand before the people of India as the perfidious violators of our national engagements. We might look with great complacency at the perfect tranquillity at present prevailing in India, as the Marquess of Dalhousie did upon the state of that country when he left. A short time before quitting India the Marquess of Dalhousie, in the plenitude of his power, and with all the arrogance of office, told one of the Native Princes that he regarded him no more than the dust beneath his feet. That Native Prince was the Nizam, and but a very few months afterwards it was to the loyalty, good faith, and eminent services of that Native Prince that we owed the salvation of our Indian Empire. He should say no more. The House was asked for a Committee in order to enable those who brought forward the Motion to prove their case. That request was made in the name of justice, and they trusted their appeal would not be made in vain.

MR. VANSITTART said, he could not help rising to express his regret at the tone of that part of the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Dumbartonshire in which he assailed so unfairly the administration of Lord Harris. It was quite unnecessary to say a word in vindication of Lord Harris's Government of Madras, which was admitted by all impartial and competent authorities to be such as to entitle him to be regarded as one of the most just and successful governors who had ever presided over that presidency. The Motion of his hon. Friend completely confirmed the predictions as to the result of transferring India from the late East India Company to the more immediate influence of the House of Commons—namely, that every conceivable grievance, with or without the slightest foundation, would be brought forward in the House, and, if possible, converted into a party question. The Carnatic, which formed the subject of his hon. Friend's Motion, became the theatre in which, during the last century, the English contested for the mastery in India against the combined forces of the Mah-rattas and the French—now, happily, our truest and firmest allies. The House should distinctly bear in mind that even at that far distant period the title of Nawab of the Carnatic was merely nominal and titular, the British Government having assumed all actual power. These events, therefore, having occurred upwards of a century ago, and in 1855 it having been resolved, on the last Nawab dying without any lineal heirs, that this titular, empty, and useless dignity should expire, it would be quite loss of time to refer the claims of his hon. Friend's client to a Select Committee. By doing so they would establish a most dangerous precedent, for it could not fail to give encouragement to native pretenders to set up the most unfounded claims to provinces now in their possession, provided they possessed sufficient influence to secure the services of an hon. Member of that House to advocate them. It appeared to him that, should it be deemed expedient to interfere in such a case as that under consideration, the preferable course to pursue would be to refer it to the India House, to be investigated and reported upon by a Committee selected from the members of the Indian Council. [A laugh.] His hon. Friend might laugh, but the Members of that Council, from their ready access to papers and documents—and the claim had been frequently very closely inquired into—and from their superior Indian experience, would be more likely to draw up a satisfactory report than could be done by a Committee of that House. Besides which, he knew upon the most undoubted and reliable authority, that the Members of that Council were actually sighing and pining for the want of something to do beyond the arduous duty of drawing their salaries, and therefore it would be an act of charity to refer the inquiry to such a Committee.

COLONEL SYKES said, if the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ayrshire had read Orme and the Carnatic Treaties he would have been aware of the relations which had existed between the Nawabs of the Carnatic and ourselves, and the assistance which we had received from the family in our struggles with the French for the mastery in India, and might have been induced to look with more favour upon the Motion before the House. In 1787 there were two Nawabs at the same time, one of whom was Dupleix, the French Commander, who had assumed the dignity, and the other Mahomed Ali, who supported us. In 1787 we made a treaty offensive and defensive with Mahomed Ali, in conjunction with the Nizam, by which the Government of the Carnatic, as a free government, was made over to Mahomed Ali and his heirs for ever. In that treaty it was declared that Shah Aulum, the Emperor at Delhi, who was paramount Lord with the approval of the Soubahdar of the Deccan, released the Nawab from all dependence upon the Emperor and the Soubahdar of the Deccan, and that he and his heirs for all time should enjoy the free government of the Carnatic. The person who drew up the treaty said, "with the approval of the Soubah;" but that showed the ignorance which prevailed at that time among officials in India, because "soubah" meant a large territory or province, whereas "soubahdar" meant the person who governed it. The rights so given necessarily descended to the Nawab's children and successors, whoever they might be. Was there any treaty to the effect that they had given up their possessions? Not at all. But after we had fixed on the Nawab an enormous debt, ostensibly for maintaining him in the nawabship, but really to strengthen ourselves against the French, we forced a treaty upon him by which, in consideration of receiving one-fifth of the net revenue, or something about £130,000 a year, he would hand over the civil and military power, and the deswanny, or collection of the revenue of the Carnatic. But, though there was a second treaty guaranteeing the same conditions, the Nawab had doubts and suspicions, which remained upon his mind for several years.

There was a passage in the diary of the Marquess of Hastings, in 1813—twelve years after the Treaty of 1801—in which he said that the Nawab had expressed his anxiety for an assurance that the Marquess should cause the provisions of the treaty to be observed. He had been told that the Nawab was in great alarm lest he should be still further degraded. The Marquess, in reply, said that

"The treaty plighted the public faith of the nation, and therefore it must be his duty to maintain its terms according to its true spirit. Treaties ought always to be construed most favourably for the party whose whole dependence was on the honour of the other."

But one of the terms of the treaty was the possession of the titular dignity by the Nawab, his heirs and successors. But if there was any doubt on the subject, what objection could there be to let it go before a Committee of that House—before a body of men who would judge impartially whether the construction put upon the treaty was justified or not? It would be some consolation to the party concerned even to have the case considered, whatever might be the result of the inquiry. He had been reminded that, as an East Indian Director, he had signed a despatch confirming the Government view of the case, and that he was now, therefore, arguing against former convictions. To that taunt he replied that despatches were signed ministerially by the directors, thirteen of whom had to sign, and that the opinions he entertained at the time he signed that despatch were the same as those he entertained now. He trusted, therefore, the House would send the matter to a Committee.

Mr. LOWE said, the case was capable of being stated in a few words. The first Nawab of the Carnatic owed his elevation to the power of England, and as a reward for the assistance he had given her in the struggle between Lawrence and Dupleix. His son who succeeded him died in 1790, and the next in succession died in 1800. When we took Seringapatam we discovered that a correspondence of a highly treasonable nature had been carried on in cipher, which proved that the Nawab was one of the allies of Tippoo Sultan. Unfortunately for the Nawab, the key to the cipher was also found, so that the meaning of the correspondence became known. Upon finding that the Marquess of Wellesley declared at once in council that he considered the Nawabship of the Carnatic was forfeited by Omdut ool Omrah, and that it was his right, if he thought fit, to take possession of the country forthwith; but he considered it would be best, from motives of leniency and policy, to take away from the Nawab only the civil and military administration, and to make him a suitable allowance of about one-fifth of the revenue. The proposition was made to a person who appeared to represent the Nawab's family, but who declined to have anything to do with a treaty handing over the government of the Carnatic to the East India Company. Another person—Azeem ul Dowlah—was then sought out, and that was the person with whom the treaty was concluded. The territory became British property in consequence of seizure on account of treason; but the Indian authorities were content to surrender a certain amount on specified conditions, and not finding the elder branch willing to agree to those conditions, they fixed upon the younger branch. The treaty made on that occasion was quite different from that executed in 1792, for nothing was said in it about heirs or successors. There were some words in it about perpetual alliance and friendship, but these were words of course which appeared in every treaty, whatever might be its nature. There was no doubt as to the intention of the Marquess of Wellesley, for, according to the first draught of the treaty made by Lord Clive, the new Nawab was stated to succeed by inheritance from his ancestors, and Lord Wellesley wrote to Lord Clive that that should be cancelled, and that it should be made to appear that the Nawab held by the grace and favour of the Company. That was done, and the new Nawab assented in that manner to the treaty. In 1819 that Nawab died, and the case was referred to the Government, and they decided as a matter of policy that the son should succeed; and a new treaty was not deemed necessary, on the ground that the son succeeding was included ipso facto in the former treaty. The proper construction of those words was, that as soon as the English Government agreed that the son should succeed, he became entitled to all the stipulations of the treaty which existed for the benefit of the Nawab, his predecessor. The same thing was repeated in 1825; but at last the English Government, exercising the same control over the succession, decided that the time was come to put an end to the pageantry they had created. He did not say that such transactions as these were matters which any one could look at with great pleasure; but the treaty and the acts of the Government were all consistent. The treaty was meant to give no right of inheritance, and the Government by their acts exercised the right of deciding whether or not there should be a new Nawab. Therefore, it would answer no good purpose to have a Committee to inquire into these transactions. It appeared to him that no good purpose could be answered by appointing a Committee. There really seemed to be no end to these Indian questions. Such questions slumbered for years, and, long after they had been considered settled, hon. Gentlemen took them from the shelf, and again revived them. It certainly appeared to him that if these elements of uncertainty were allowed to be imported into the consideration of such questions, there was danger of our Indian empire being shaken to its foundation.

The House divided:—Ayes 62; Noes 45: Majority 17.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

The following Votes to complete were agreed to:—

(1.) £2,928, to complete the sum for the Office of the Comptroller General of the Exchequer.

(2.) £22,903, to complete the sum for the Office of Works and Public Buildings.

(3.) £20,225, to complete the sum for the Office of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues.

(4.) £14,651, to complete the sum for the Office of Public Records, &c.

(5.) £213,810, to complete the sum for Poor Law Commissions.

(6.) £41,867, to complete the sum for the Establishment of the Mint.

(7.) £26,647, to complete the sum for the Inspectors of Factories, &c.

(8.) £4,235, to complete the sum for the Exchequer and other Offices in Scotland.

(9.) £4,434, to complete the sum for the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(10.) £11,695, to complete the sum for the Offices of the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

(11.) £2,782, to complete the sum for the Office of Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, Ireland.

(12.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £17,431, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Public Works in Ireland."

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he would take that occasion to ask, What the intentions of the Government were with respect to any change in the Office of Public Works in Ireland?

MR. PEEL said, the Government did not propose to make any change in the Board of Public Works in Ireland at present. Sir R. Griffiths, who held the position of its chairman, and who had several other important public duties to perform, was desirous of resigning a portion of his offices, the labours of which at his advanced age he found to be somewhat too heavy, and a Bill had been introduced by the Government for the purpose of making it sufficient if the Commission of Public Works consisted of two persons only, instead of three, as required by law. That Bill had, however, been abandoned, it having been considered that a better course would be that Sir R. Griffiths should retire from the chairmanship; that one of the two remaining Commissioners should be appointed to that office, and that Sir R. Griffiths should act as an ordinary Commissioner. His colleagues would thus continue to have the benefit of his advice, and the arrangement would, he thought, be found to be generally satisfactory, besides rendering it unnecessary to make any change in the law.

MR. BUTT remarked, that the Board of Works was one of the most unpopular institutions in Ireland, and the reason why it was so was, that there was no real responsibility. He thought the arrangement stated to be in contemplation amounted to an evasion of the Act of Parliament, which required that there should be three Commissioners, for it was evident that Sir R. Griffiths was to be merely a consulting member of the Board.

MR. MONSELL said, he could not but express his regret that Sir R. Griffiths, who was so popular in Ireland, and who discharged his duties so satisfactorily, should be obliged to surrender any portion of them because of decaying vigour. The best course to pursue with regard to the Office of Works in Ireland would, he thought, be to place at its head an able man, to furnish him with an efficient staff, and to make him responsible for the manner in which the works were executed.

MR. BLAKE said, he wished to have some information from the Government with respect to the office of Inspector of Fisheries in Ireland. He had himself been the victim of the ill temper of Mr. Barry, who was an old man of eighty, and seldom went out of doors, and was so irascible that if a person differed from him upon any point, he would not only not get his business done, but would be insulted, as he (Mr. Blake) had been. He had already had occasion to bring his conduct under the notice of the House, and he should be compelled to do so again unless he received a satisfactory answer from the Secretary of the Treasury that it was not intended to continue him in his office.

MR. PEEL said, that a Commission was at present inquiring into the subject of the Deep Sea Fisheries, and there was no intention to change the existing arrangements before its report was received.

MR. BUTT said, he wished to call attention to the fact that, whilst the Inspecting Commissioner of Fisheries received £600 per annum, the legal member of the Board, who had to discharge very important judicial functions with regard to the rights of property which yielded £200,000 a year, had only £350 a year salary. Questions of vast importance to the owners of property came before him for decision, and he knew of an instance where an eminent Irish barrister was taken before him to plead at a fee of 150 guineas, with appropriate refreshers. He thought the salary was ridiculously low for the discharge of such important duties. He should move the reduction of the Vote by £500, in order to bring the question before the Committee.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £500, for the Salary of the Inspecting Commissioners of Fisheries, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Butt.)

MR. PEEL said, the principle upon which the legal Commissioner was paid only £350 per annum was this. In the case of the legal member of the Fisheries Commission for Scotland, his salary was limited by the Scotch Act to three guineas per day, and not more than £350 per annum, and the Home Office recommended to the Treasury that a similar limit should be applied in Ireland. When Mr. Morris was appointed, the Government did not know the full extent of the responsibility that was to devolve upon him. An application had been made to the Treasury for an increase of salary, but it was desirable not to revise it until they had had further opportunities of considering the importance of the duties to be performed.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he trusted her Majesty's Government would re-consider the amount of salary with as little delay as possible. It was preposterous to suppose that £350 was an adequate salary when they paid the Secretary to the Commission £500 a year.

MR. BLAKE said, he regretted to learn that Mr. Eden, one of the ablest members of the Commission, whose judgments were marked by signal ability, only received £100 for his labours in Ireland, over and above the salary of £500, which he received for the duties in England that he still continued to discharge.

MR. HENNESSY said, he could not but complain that no Member of the Irish Government was present during the discussion of the Estimates relating to Ireland, especially as there was a Motion of the hon. Member for Limerick county on the books complaining of a failure of justice. It had been stated that the legal Commissioner only received £350, and there ought to be some explanation given in respect to this matter, for a very exceeding failure of justice was said to have taken place. Decisions had been given involving hundreds of thousands of pounds, and it now appeared that those decisions were illegal. In fact, the gentleman who had given them, and who had been appointed by the Government, had declared that his decisions were illegal and improper. That being the case, it was a very serious matter, and he thought the Attorney General for Ireland should have been present to give the necessary explanations. The Vote for the Irish Chief Secretary's office created discussion in former years, but they had taken a silent vote for it that night, and in the Chief Secretary's absence. To enable some Member of the Irish Government to be present to answer the necessary inquiries, he moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press his Motion, and thus mar their chance of getting rid of Committee of Supply that night.

MR. MONSELL said, he wished to point out that the Scotch Fishery Commissioners had no judicial functions to perform, so that the analogy sought to be established failed altogether. The Secretary to the Treasury overlooked the fact that persons whose property was at stake, and was ultimately forfeited, had a right to expect that their cases would be decided by a competent tribunal. It was understood that one of the Irish Commissioners should be a barrister of the highest eminence, and he put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether he thought the services of such a gentleman were to be had in Ireland at £350 a year. The Fisheries Bill had so far worked well. The receipts for fish in one district had increased from £105 last year to £710 this year, and the value of the nets from £49 and £98 to £128 and £180. The Government ought to pay an adequate sum for the services rendered.

MR. LONGFIELD said, the salary required augmentation. He was sorry Mr. Morris had resigned, but he hoped the Government would give him something more than his salary for the services he had rendered, and that they would materially increase the pay of his successor.

THE CHAIRMAN rose and said, that he must remind the Committee that the discussion was irregular, as it referred to an item in the Vote that had been passed.

MR. BUTT said, that in that case he would withdraw his Amendment, and raise the discussion on the Report.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed,

"That the Item of £500, for the Salary of the Inspecting Commissioners of Fisheries, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Butt.)

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he would request the hon. Member for the King's County to follow the example. Any observations which he thought necessary might be made upon the Report.

MR. HENNESSY said, he hoped that when the Report was brought up the Attorney General for Ireland would follow the example of the noble Viscount and be in his place.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(13.) £26,512, to complete the sum for the Commissioners of Audit.

(14.) £14,125, to complete the sum for the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission.

MR. W. WILLIAMS suggested that the sum was large for the mere duties of a tithe commission, which must be small.

MR. PEEL explained that the duties of the Commissioners were not only with regard to tithe, but to inclosures of land as well, and were very heavy.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he wished to know what was the meaning of the items for newspapers and railway guides.

MR. PEEL said, the Commission was required to advertise, and, therefore, the newspapers were necessary. It also sent agents over the country, and, therefore, needed railway guides.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) £9,290, to complete the sum for Imprest Expenses under the Inclosure and Drainage Acts.

(16.) £50,955, to complete the sum for the General Register Office.

(17.) £11,440, to complete the sum for the National Debt Office.

(18.) £2,795 to complete the sum for the Public Works Loan Commission, and West India Islands Relief Commission.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS requested some explanation as to the purposes to which the money was devoted, and what the Commissioners did.

MR. J. A. SMITH said, he wished to know if there was any prospect of the Commissions terminating.

MR. PEEL said, the same persons filled both Commissions. The Public Works Loan Commission had a sum of £360,000 advanced annually out of the Consolidated Fund, of which £60,000 went for works in Ireland; latterly they had also the further annual sum of £250,000 to advance for improvements of harbours. All these advances were repaid by instalments. The West India Islands Relief Commission was appointed under an Act of Will. IV., for the purpose of administering funds amounting altogether to about a million, which was advanced for the relief of the planters of Jamaica after the emancipation of the negroes, and to the planters of Barbadoes, St. Vincent, and St. Lucia. The money was repayable by instalments, extending over thirty years, of which eighteen had expired, and the duties of the Commissioners were to take measures to obtain the payment of these instalments. The cost of the Commission was about £1,000 a year.

Vote agreed to.

(19.) £5,172, to complete the sum for the Lunacy Commission.

(20.) £1,223, General Superintendent of County Roads, South Wales.

MR. CAIRD said, the Vote bore a striking resemblance to the Vote rejected some years ago for Highland roads and bridges, and ought to share the same fate.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he should oppose the Vote, as the people of South Wales ought to support their own roads, and pay for their superintendence.

MR. PEEL said, the Public Works Loan Commissioners some years ago advanced £250,000 to construct roads in South Wales, the repayment of which was spread over a period of years. These instalments had been regularly paid, and there were still twelve years byer which the repayment would extend. The business of the superintendent was to superintend the financial operations of the county Boards, to make out the estimate for the repair of the roads, and to see that the sum required for the payment of the instalments was duly provided for. The office of superintendent would be abolished when the whole of the loan had been repaid.

MR. O'REILLY observed, that when similar loans were advanced in Ireland it was not found necessary to have a superintendent to recover the debts.

MR. DILLWYN said, he believed the office of superintendent was created in consequence of the exceptional legislation applied some years ago to South Wales.

MR. CAIRD remarked, that the annual instalments payable by the counties should include the cost of superintendence.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would take upon himself the responsibility of moving the rejection of the Vote.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he should support the Vote, which he trusted the Committee would pass.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, the money was borrowed some years ago; and it was the duty of the superintendent to see that the roads were not starved, and that the proper preparations were made, when necessary, for providing the money necessary to pay off the instalments of the borrowed principal.

Vote agreed to.

(21.) £1,453, to complete the sum for Registrars of Friendly Societies.

(22.) £14,823, to complete the sum for the Charity Commission.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to know what were the duties of the Commissioners?

MR. H. A. BRUCE stated, that there were no less than 50,000 charities in Great Britain, with an income of nearly £3,000,000; and that no officers could perform their arduous duties with greater industry and zeal than those in whose favour the Vote was sought.

Vote agreed to.

(23.) £4,442, to complete the sum for the Local Government Act Office.

(24.) £1,244, to complete the sum for the Landed Estates Record Offices.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he rose to ask for an explanation of the Vote. The Keeper of the Records in Dublin received a salary of £400 a year. Who was he?

MR. PEEL said, there used to be an auditor of the Land Revenues who had charge of the records. The office was abolished, the accounts were transferred to the Board of Audit, and the office of Keeper of the Records was created. It was connected with the sale and purchase of the Crown lands.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to know whether the Keeper of the Records was Mr. Harding?

MR. PEEL said, he did not know the name of the officer in question.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that if the office was connected with the sale and purchase of the Crown lands exclusively, it ought to be a charge against the revenues of the Woods and Forests.

MR. HENNESSY said, that perhaps the Attorney General for Ireland could tell the Committee the name of the Keeper of the Records.

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) could only say that it was not a legal office, and that he had never heard of it before.

MR. ESMONDE: The answer is, Non mi ricordo.

MR. HENNESSY: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland can tell us.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: It is Mr. W. Harding.

COLONEL DUNNE: The Secretary to the Treasury just now told us it was not Mr. Harding.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: It is, though.

MR. SCULLY: Yes, he kept a cellar in the Custom House at Dublin. He had known Mr. Harding for thirty years. It was singular that no Member of the Irish Government knew the name of the Keeper of the Records. That came of having no Irishman connected with the Government of Ireland. He saw the index finger of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for Ireland pointed at the noble Lord at the head of the Government, but the noble Viscount knew perfectly well he was not born in Ireland. He was the Civis Romanus of England. The noble Lord was an English Gentleman, but he became an Irishman when it suited the purposes of those about him. The truth was that there was no Irishman in the Cabinet. The Lord Lieutenant who was sent over to Ireland in an ornamental character was an Englishman, and, as for the Chief Secretary, he was as much an Irishman as he (Mr. Scully) was an Englishman, because his mother was an Englishwoman.

MR. MASSEY said, he hoped the hon. Gentleman would confine his remarks to the subject before the Committee.

MR. BUTT said, to constitute a Keeper of Records there must be two things — records to be kept and a man to keep them. But the Attorney General for Ireland had never heard of those records, for the keeping of which the House was asked to vote £1,000 a year.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, the office had been formerly called the Quit Rent Office, but recently its name had been changed. The Landed Estates Office was, in fact, the old Quit Rent Office.

MR. SCULLY said, he believed those offices were entirely different. He wanted to know whether there was really a Quit Rent Office.

MR. PEEL said, the object of the office was to record the transactions connected with estates in which the Crown had an interest, and the Crown's landed interest in Ireland consisting chiefly of quit rents, the deeds to be recorded were very numerous.

Vote agreed to.

(25.) £446, to complete the sum for Quarantine Expenses, and (26.) £24,000, to complete the sum for Secret Service.

(27.) £254,165, to complete the sum for Printing and Stationery.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that this Vote was constantly increasing. While the expense of the printing of papers ordered by Parliament amounted only to about £17,000, the cost of papers laid upon the table "by command," as it was called — that is, by the departments when they wish to conceal the printing done for themselves, was no less than £15,000. A paper moved for by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, and printed only last April, contained a Treasury Minute relative to the slovenly manner in which the departments sent their papers to the printer. It was a shame after all the competitive examinations which they had, that the departments could not be got to turn out their papers in a correct form, and that the public should be saddled on that account with an expense which on the computation of the Controller of the Stationery Department amounted to £15,000.

MR. PEEL said, that the Vote was considerably less than last year, although the business which gave rise to the expenditure was constantly increasing. Although the nominal amount of the Vote was £344,165, yet in reality it should be reduced by £65,000, which came back into the Exchequer as the proceeds of sales, profits of the Gazettes, and other receipts. The Treasury Minute had been promulgated in consequence of the slovenly way in which the manuscripts had been prepared for printing.

MR. HENNESSY said, that the careless way in which the papers were sent to the press was not the fault of the clerks, but of the heads of the departments, who, it was shown, sent in the first part of the composition of a blue-book before the second part was even thought of.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, the expenses of Parliamentary printing greatly depended on the number of Returns which were moved for by hon. Members. Only a day or two ago an immense blue-book had been printed concerning convictions for game offences, which he believed was a great waste of public money. The cost of stationery for the War Office and the Admiralty last year was £76,000, while in the two great departments of Customs and Inland Revenue the cost was only £57,000. He thought the former amount required some explanation.

MR. SCULLY said, he thought that a vast saving might be effected, and benefit conferred on Members, if the latter could be provided with only just the blue-books they required. Every Session tons of papers were sent to Members' houses which they never read, and of which they were somewhat troubled to dispose. It would be much better to circulate lists of papers printed, and let Members have what they wanted. The expenses of printing for the different departments were prodigious, and might be considerably cut down, and he thought the printing for the different departments might be advantageously consolidated.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, this item was an illustration of the fact, that when once an expenditure got to a high figure there was no bringing it down again. From the year 1835 to the time of the Crimean war the Vote under consideration never exceeded £260,000. In the following year it increased to £400,000, and had never been less since that time. The discussions which had taken place showed that the House was not so much to blame as was generally supposed, for the printing which took place under its direction was not liable to much complaint. He should like to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer who was the party who exercised any control over the departmental expenditure. Of late years some of the departments had taken to printing neat essays at the public expense, which few persons ever read. In the old Tory days of Lord Liverpool a much stricter control was exercised over the departments in these matters than was exercised at the present time.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he wished to know what saving had been effected in the Stationery Department in consequence of the reduction of the paper duty. It was stated by the controller, that the moderation of the present estimate was owing, in a great degree, to the reduction of that duty, but the amount was larger this year than in the preceding year.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that if the hon. Gentleman wished to ascertain the direct effect of the repeal of the paper duty on the estimate, it could no doubt be supplied by the Stationery Office. That effect, however, was not to be measured by the amount saved in duty, because it had effected a still more important result by extending the operations of trade. With respect to the question of the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby), he had to state that the expense of printing ordered by the House was entirely within its own control. The only control exercised over the Government Departments was that of the Treasury, and that control was not less than it was forty or fifty years ago. In looking at the expense of printing regard should be had to the circumstance that the different establishments had been very much enlarged, and that their business had considerably increased. The enormous demand for information was quite new in our history, which although it led to increased expense could not be regarded with unmixed dissatisfaction. No doubt the dissemination of information had been the means of bringing up a feeling of affectionate loyalty amongst the people towards the system under which they lived. The practice now adopted was this. The controller exercised his best discretion with regard to printing, and discharged his duties with proper vigilance. Whenever he thought that the expenses incurred by one department were extraordinary in amount he called the attention of the Treasury to the fact; but with so much other business pressing upon them it was difficult for the Treasury to give the necessary attention to the matter. He was glad the attention of the House had been called to this expenditure, and thought that some time it might form a very proper subject of inquiry.

MR. PEEL observed, that the whole expenses of printing and stationery were now in one Vote; but formerly the printing and stationery of a department were included in the estimate for that department. The change had the effect of increasing the item now under consideration; but, of course, the vote of each department was reduced at the same time.

MR. HADFIELD said, he should be very sorry to see any curtailment of the information given to the House and to the public.

COLONEL W. STUART said, he observed from a note in the estimate that there was some Return which had been in preparation for the last three years, and had been corrected twenty times. He should like to know what it was. Perhaps it was one of the missing despatches.

MR. PEEL said, he was unable to inform the hon. and gallant Gentleman of the exact nature of the Return to which he had just referred.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. Scully

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, the Vote contained an item of £190, postage for the Lord Chancellor. The postage for the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland only amounted to £50, and none was charged for the Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

MR. HIBBERT observed, that the postage for the Poor Law Commissioners was increased from £4,305, its amount last year, to £5,280. The Commissioners interfered in so many small matters that they made themselves unbearable to Boards of Guardians, and thus it was that the expense for postage increased.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he wished to ask what was the reason the sum for the postage of the Admiralty had increased from £13,945 to £17,000?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the estimate was founded on the expenditure of the past year. The correspondence was increasing in every department, as greater information was required from public officers.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to notice that in the postage for inland letters there was a jump from 2d. to 4d. if a letter exceeded the weight of an ounce in the slightest degree. He wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the 3d. adhesive stamp, which was already in use for colonial purposes, might not be allowed to be used for letters weighing more than one ounce, and not more than an ounce and a half?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he had not had any communication with the officers of the Post Office on the proposal now made, but he would communicate with them in reference to it. He was, however, not certain that it was worth while to interfere with the existing system which, on the whole, worked very well.

MR. SCULLY hoped the right hon. Gentleman would inquire into the general question, so as to ascertain whether it would be desirable to adopt uniformly a rate per ounce or half-ounce. At present one could divide the contents of a letter and send the parts separately cheaper than he could send them together. He noticed that the sum paid for postage last year for the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was £45, and that the sum of £50 was now asked for. The postage of the Irish Office was also increased from £220 to £275. The postage of the Chief Secretary for Ireland had nearly doubled, it having increased from £710 to £1,390.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that the correspondence of the department had enormously increased. Last year the active measures taken to ascertain the state of the country and every part of Ireland had, no doubt, nearly doubled the correspondence.

Vote agreed to.

(29.) £25,115, to complete the sum for Law Charges, England.

(30.) £144,923, to complete the sum for Prosecutions at Assizes and Quarter Sessions.

(31.) £184,050, to complete the sum for Police Counties and Boroughs, Great Britain.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, he wished to call attention to the deductions which had been made by the Treasury in the one-fourth contributed by the Government to the pay and clothing of the county police. For five years after the Act of 1856, regulating the county police, came into force, the one-fourth allowed by Government had been given in the gross expenses of pay and clothing of the constabulary; but in 1862 a notice was issued by the Treasury which, much to the surprise of the counties, made certain deductions from the sum upon which that one-fourth had previously been paid. The deductions made were for the amounts paid by the counties for lodgings, medical attendance, superannuation allowances, and for fines. The result had been great dissatisfaction, and strong representations had been made to the Treasury on the subject; and eventually the two first items were struck off, deductions were confined to payments of the superannuation fund and to fines. That was literally a question of what was the legal construction of stoppages. There was great dissatisfaction, and small as the sum was the principle was great. He trusted that the Government would yield to a simple demand for justice. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving—

"That the deductions now made were contrary to the provisions and intentions of the Act of Parliament, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69, which never contemplated that payments made by the police to the Superannuation Fund and fines should be taken account of in calculating the amount to be paid by the Treasury."

LORD LOVAINE said, there could be no doubt that the original compact, when the counties were induced, or rather compelled to raise the police force, was that one-fourth of the amount of the cost of each force should be repaid by the Treasury.

MR. PEELE said, he found it necessary to examine with great care the claims of local jurisdiction, and in repaying one-fourth of the county police he could not help thinking that they were justified in making the deductions in question. They found there was a tendency in making the claims to place new charges in the account, which had not formerly been included. The practice was growing up in many of the counties of increasing nominally the pay of the constables, either by converting the allowances to which the Government did not contribute into pay, or by granting an increase of pay, but stopping it to defray rents which had not previously been required to be paid; and thus, while no benefit was derived by the constables, an increased amount was obtained from the Government. Thus, in Hampshire, until September, 1862, the superintendents and superior officers had never been charged anything for the rent of their stations. Since that date their pay had been increased; but the increase was stopped from them under the plea of being a payment for rent of the stations. Thus the nominal pay was increased, and the portion to be paid by the Government was also increased, but the police had no corresponding benefit. Under these circumstances the Treasury thought it necessary to institute a strict examination, and to require the county officers to give in detailed returns for every item. His hon. Friend complained of the deduction on account of stoppages of fines; but if £10 was stopped out of a constable's pay in the year, why should not the Government have the benefit of one-fourth of that amount when it paid one-fourth of the pay from which that £10 was stopped? It might be that the county would raise the entire £10 for the pay of the constable; but it was not what the county raised, but what it paid that the Government were to keep in view. And with regard to the superannuation, if they contributed one-fourth, the Government would be paying what they were not authorized under the act to do. There was, moreover, a precedent in the case of the Civil Service. When deductions on account of the superannuation Fund were made in the Civil Service, the amount was not considered a portion of the pay, and no income tax was charged on the deductions. However, he was willing to refer the question to the Law Officers of the Crown, and if they were of opinion that the Government ought to pay one-fourth of the deduction for superannuation deductions, he would have no objection.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he had no doubt that the proposal just made would prove satisfactory to his hon. Friend; but, at the same time, he wished to point out the fallacy into which the hon. Member the Secretary of the Treasury had fallen. He said the Act of Parliament threw upon the Government the payment to the counties of one-fourth of their expenses in certain matters, and introduced the instance of the income tax as an analogy to what the Government had to pay in this case. But the income tax was not a case in point; for when the income tax was to be levied, it was the duty of the officials to ascertain what the man received into his pocket. In this case, on the other hand, what was to be considered was the amount paid by the county. If the Government were advised that the allowances were equitable, and would act upon such advice, he was sure the result would prove satisfactory to his hon. Friend.

MR. HENLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Peel) had brought into the discussion matters which might be analogous, but which certainly were not relevant. The right hon. Gentleman claimed credit for the Government that they had saved £100,000 in the matter of prosecutions; but every one knew that that attempt at saving had been the cause of much greater mischief. Since the cutting down of the allowance to witnesses, it was almost impossible to get a second conviction. Constables, gaolers, and others who could prove former convictions against thieves were oftentimes troubled with very short memories, because they knew that in giving proof their expenses would not be adequately defrayed. That was the result of the economy—not economy, but parsimony—of the hon. Gentleman. It was a mean and nasty exercise of power not founded on right or reason, but on the principle of "We won't pay." Hence thieves got off, and there was more expense incurred in the end. Nothing could be more unfair than the conduct of the Treasury with regard to the immediate question under discussion, for what did the right hon. Gentleman say? His argument was that he had learned that certain counties had entered upon queer practices with regard to payments to their constables; but instead of trying to put a stop to these improper practices, the Government proposed to make an entire change in an unjust direction.

MR. HIBBERT said, he would bear testimony to the illiberal treatment of police officers who were witnesses upon prosecutions, and to the injurious consequences arising therefrom.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, that having raised the question he would rather leave it to be dealt with fairly by the Treasury, and therefore would not press his Amendment.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN drew attention to the circumstance that, while the costs of erecting and repairing court-houses in England and Scotland were placed upon the Estimates, in Ireland the charge was paid out of the county rates.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that there were other cases in which Ireland by local taxation paid for what in England was paid for out of the national purse.

MR. PEEL said, the Estimates set forth the authority or Acts of Parliament under which the provision for repairing and building county court-houses was made.

Vote agreed to.

(48.) £26,231, to complete the sum for Expenses connected with the Sheriff Court, Scotland.

(49.) £14,105, to complete the sum for Salaries of the Procurators Fiscal, Scotland.

MR. WHITESIDE inquired what was the precise nature of the duties of a Procurator Fiscal? He wished to know whether they were analogous to the duties of a coroner in England?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the Procurator Fiscal in Scotland is the public prosecutor for the county. He acts directly under the instructions of the Sheriff; and his duty is, in case of death under suspicious circumstances being reported to him, to cause an inquiry to take place, and, if he sees fit, to apply to the Sheriff for a warrant of examination, or to apprehend in case of suspicion attaching to any one. If the matter be serious, and there seems to be sufficient ground for proceedings, he reports the examination to the Lord Advocate or his Deputies. It is under the Sheriff's warrant that all these proceedings take place. His duty is to take recognitions, which are not generally taken on oath, and the Advocate Depute either indicts or takes the advice of the Lord Advocate. The proceeding differs from that of a coroner's inquest. The investigation is not public in the first instance, but takes place under judicial responsibility, and ultimately under the responsibility of the Lord Advocate. I stated the other evening, and I expressed the view of those most competent to form a judgment on the subject, that although it is quite true that these investigations before trial are not public, they are in many instances a great advantage—indeed, they are a double benefit. In the first place, they secure, I think most efficiently, the conviction of the guilty, and conduce most effectually to the protection of the innocent; for there can be no doubt whatever that preliminary investigations before coroners and grand juries have sometimes resulted in the escape of the real criminals, and, in other cases, attached a stigma to the names of parties altogether blameless. Such is the nature of the functions of the Procurator Fiscal, and, in my opinion, the system works admirably.

MR. WHITESIDE: Do the Procurators Fiscal act of their own motion, or are instructions issued to them?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: In cases of sudden death, there are instructions from Crown Counsel or from the Lord Advocate to the Procurator Fiscal to make inquiry. In other cases, complaint is usually made to the Procurator Fiscal.

MR. WHITESIDE: The inquiry before the Procurator is private?

THE LORD ADVOCATE: The inquiry is not public until the whole investigation has taken place. It is confined to the department of the Public Prosecutor.

Vote agreed to.

(50.) £10,250, to complete the sum for Salaries of the Sheriff's Clerks, Scotland.

MR. WHITESIDE asked whether it was intended to bring in a measure for the regulation of the duties of the Sheriffs Substitute and the Sheriffs Depute? He had received a very well written pamphlet on the subject.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I may remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that in 1853 the whole of this subject received the most careful consideration before a Select Committee; and the Act of 1857, which now regulates the Sheriffs Courts, was based on the Report of that Committee. I believe the Act has given general satisfaction, and it is not my intention to propose any alteration in it.

Vote agreed to.

The Lord Advocate

(56.) £3,717, to complete the sum for the Court of Chancery, Ireland.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that the appointment of examiner in chief was in the hands of the Master of the Rolls; and that Judge, believing that there could be no worse mode of taking evidence than by an examiner sitting in a back room, would not appoint anybody to that office, which was vacant. He (Mr. Whiteside) wished to know whether it was intended to persevere in this mode of taking evidence?

MR. O'HAGAN said, he hoped that under the Bill for the reform of the Court of Chancery the duties of the examiner would in the main be transferred to another office. He hoped this explanation would satisfy the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. WHITESIDE said, it by no means satisfied him. He wanted to know whether the practice of taking evidence in writing was to be continued?

MR. O'HAGAN repeated that the Bill provided for the mode of taking evidence hereafter; but depositions in writing would be still necessary in some cases.

Vote agreed to.

(61.) £1,360, to complete the sum for the Office for Registration of Judgments, Ireland.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that the law of judgments in Ireland was in a very confused and unsatisfactory state, and he hoped the system in Ireland would be assimilated to that of England after the Committee upstairs had reported.

MR. O'HAGAN said, the law in Ireland was in a disgraceful position, and he would exert himself to improve it.

MR. HADFIELD said, that no expenses ought to be incurred in reference to these offices than what would be absolutely necessary.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he thought that some stop ought to be put to the publication of the "Black List," which inflicted a great deal of injustice upon some parties.

MR. HADFIELD said, it was an inconvenience which landed proprietors had to submit to, but he trusted the nuisance would be removed.

MR. KEKEWICH said, he wished to call attention to the outbreak which took place at the Dartmoor prison in November last, and to ask why the military had been withdrawn from the prison, and whether any means had been adopted to obtain the immediate assistance of the military in case it should be required.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that in the outbreak to which the hon. Gentleman referred the convicts in general took no part. It arose from the attempt of thirteen convicts to make their escape, but they were all captured, and none of the other prisoners had given them any assistance. The number of convicts had since been reduced. With regard to the other question, during the Russian war the troops had been withdrawn from most of the prisons, and a civil guard substituted. Since the occurrence in question a telegraphic communication had been established between the prison at Dartmoor and the residence of the Commander-in-Chief at Plymouth, so that he might readily send troops to the aid of the prison authorities whenever it might be required.

MR. KEKEWICH said, he thought it only fair to the officers of Dartmoor Prison to state, that on the occasion of the outbreak in November last they exhibited the greatest bravery and determination.

Vote agreed to.

(73.) £218,286, to complete the sum for Maintenance of Prisoners in County Gaols, &c.

(74.) £16,380, to complete the sum for Transportation of Convicts.

(75.) £101,783, to complete the sum for Convict Establishments, Colonies.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to know whether information had been received at the Colonial Office to the effect, that one of the Australian colonies had resolved to send 600 convicts to England in retaliation for our sending convicts to Australia.

MR. CARDWELL replied, that no such information had been received.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Papers relative to New Zealand Loan [presented 9th June] referred.

Resolution considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. CARDWELL said, that documents upon the subject of the state of New Zealand and the progress of the war had recently been laid on the table, and that morning papers had been circulated containing a correspondence which showed at full length the reasons which had induced him to make the proposal he was about to submit to the House. Considering, therefore, the lateness of the hour, he would confine his remarks within the shortest limits. It would be remembered that last Session a Resolution like the one he was about to propose was brought forward by his right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, on which a Bill was to be founded for the purpose of guaranteeing a New Zealand loan. The circumstances which led to the withdrawal of that Bill were stated in the correspondence on the table, and that correspondence also contained the promise of his noble Friend the Duke of Newcastle to renew the proposal this Session. The other papers in the hands of hon. Members exhibited the progress which, by the skill of General Cameron and by the gallantry of our troops, had been made in the war down to the latest advices. He would, therefore, assume that hon. Members were already as well acquainted as he was with the history of events in New Zealand, the success of our arms in the various conflicts which had occurred, and the progress made in the final settlement and pacification of the Northern Island. At the same time, he might be permitted to communicate to the House the information which had reached him that morning. In the newspapers of that day he had seen accounts which he was happy to say did not correspond with those which had reached him officially. By the present mail, accounts had been received of two conflicts between our troops and the Maories. Of these conflicts, one took place in the immediate neighbourhood of New Plymouth, and the other and more important at the principal seat of war on the upper part of the River Waikato, in the presence of General Cameron himself. The first was admitted by all to be a success, and a success, too, achieved with the smallest possible loss, not one man having been killed, and only four wounded. General Cameron and the Governor spoke of the operation in the highest terms. With respect to the other action, he had seen it spoken of in newspapers as a disaster occasioned by the failure of a subordinate, and only retrieved by a vigorous effort on the part of General Cameron himself. Hon. Members would no doubt be glad to hear from him the accounts which the Governor of New Zealand and General Cameron gave of the conflict. He had received that morning a despatch from General Cameron, in which he said—

"I received General Carey's despatch this morning. He states that 101 Maories have been killed, besides eighteen to twenty reported by Native prisoners to have been buried in the pah, thirty-three have been taken prisoners—twenty-six of them wounded. Rewi (the principal rebel) has not been found. This is the severest lesson the Maories have ever learnt, and will, I hope, have a good effect."

Then, speaking of his subordinate, Colonel Carey, he went on to say—

"Colonel Carey deserves great credit for the clever manner in which he succeeded in surrounding them."

Though unwilling to occupy the time of the House, he had thought it right to read that statement after the statements which he had seen elsewhere. He was now speaking of that which had taken place on the Upper Waikato, with respect to which Sir George Grey said—

"This action, so disastrous to the Natives, will, I sincerely trust, prove one great means of bringing this lamentable war to a conclusion. From the last telegram I have sent, you will find that one of its results has already been that the Natives have abandoned the position at Manugatautari, which the Lieutenant General was preparing to attack."

That fortress, which would probably have been taken only with great loss, was yielded up without a contest, and was in possession of our troops. The latest official information he had was couched in the satisfactory terms which he had just stated. With regard to the action spoken of in the Melbourne papers, respecting which the right hon. Gentleman had asked a question, all he could say was, that no intelligence of it had reached him, and he was not, therefore, prepared to say it was not true. After the mail left Auckland it touched at Nelson; and, therefore, if it had happened, it was probable it might have reached the newspapers that way, and could not have been forwarded with the Government despatches from Auckland. It did not, however, appear, from the list of killed and wounded, to have been of any considerable importance. But however that might be, there could be no doubt from the despatches he had received, that at the principal seat of war on the Upper Waikato, the arms of General Cameron had been successful, and that that district was in our possession, and its pacific administration, he hoped, in progress.

He came to the subject to which he had risen more immediately to address himself. The House was aware that after the close of the Taranaki war an engagement had been entered into by his noble Friend on behalf of the Government, to submit to the House a proposal to carry into effect a loan of half a million to the Government of New Zealand for the purpose of securing the repayment of a debt to the Treasury of £200,000, and of obtaining £300,000 for purposes connected with the war. A Resolution was last Session introduced to give effect to that proposal; but, for reasons stated in the correspondence, it was not carried out, and the fulfilment of the engagement had devolved upon him. Meantime, as might also be seen by the correspondence, the New Zealand Assembly determined to raise a loan amounting to £3,000,000, for which sum they requested—and the request was strongly enforced by the representations of the Governor—the guarantee of the British Government. The Finance Minister of the colony also came home with the view of pressing the point on the attention of the Government, and of giving the necessary explanations with respect to it, and he must in justice to that gentleman say, that he had displayed great ability and candour in the discharge of his mission. He himself, however, felt that, to guarantee an amount approaching £3,000,000, was an impossibility, and he knew that he could submit no such proposal to Parliament with any chance of its being accepted. He at once, therefore, set the proposal aside, and there remained the question whether, in fulfilment of the pledge previously given, we should limit the guarantee to half a million, or go beyond that amount. The House was well aware how great was the expense to which the Government of New Zealand had been put by the contest which he trusted was now drawing to a close. With that expense the guarantee for half a million had nothing to do. In the course of the war a sum closely approaching £300,000 had been advanced by the Imperial Government to the Government of the colony, and if therefore the guarantee had been confined to the sum of half a million, it was obvious that nearly the whole would have been absorbed by the debt to the Treasury, and that nothing would have remained applicable to the expenses of the New Zealand Government. He had, therefore, stated to the Colonial Treasurer that a fair question for consideration was whether the security at the disposal of the colony would cover, besides the original offer, a guarantee for the sum of £300,000 in addition, to be paid to the Imperial Treasury, and a further sum of £200,000, as portion of the expenses incurred by the Government of New Zealand, or, in other words, whether the security he could offer would cover the sum of £1,000,000. Now, the correspondence, he thought, showed that there was security sufficient to guarantee that amount with perfect safety. It appeared that for the financial year ending the 30th of June, 1863, there was a clear surplus of receipts over expenditure in New Zealand of nearly £260,000. For the present year there was an estimated surplus of more than £200,000, and it seemed that the revenue was coming in much more rapidly than the framers of that estimate contemplated. To cover the guarantee of £1,000,000 there was a clear surplus of £200,000, while the income of the colony was increasing year by year, and was independent of the land revenue, which amounted to a large sum of money, almost equal to the ordinary revenue of the colony. That being so, the Government had offered to redeem their pledge by proposing to give a guarantee for £1,000,000, to be raised at a rate not exceeding 4 per cent with a sinking fund of 2 per cent, which would involve an annual charge of £60,000. That proposal did not, he thought, extend to an unreasonable amount, or to one which was likely to cause any risk to this country. It remained for him to state the reasons which should induce this country to enter into a guarantee at all. They were based upon the fact that great expense had been entailed on the colony by the war, which had rendered it necessary that the whole male population of the province of Auckland, from the ages of sixteen to fifty-five, should be under arms at once, upon the prospect of an early pacification of the colony, and the consideration that when that pacification took place heavy expenses would have to be incurred, not only in winding up the outlay consequent upon the war, but in carrying out measures of improvement, such as the making of roads, the procuring a survey of the country, and other schemes which would afford the best security against the risks of war for the future. The correspondence, he might add, showed that it had been stated to the colonists, that if the Government consented to make to Parliament the proposal which he had mentioned, it would be on the conditions that out of the loan so raised the whole sum due to the Treasury, amounting as nearly as he could calculate to close on £500,000, should in the first instance be discharged, and that at the end of the present year the arrangement with regard to military expenditure should be terminated, and that the colony should, in future, substantially, and not merely nominally, contribute to the Imperial exchequer for any aid it might receive in a moment of emergency. The payment was to be the same as that from the Australian colonies, £40 for each man of the artillery and £55 for every artilleryman; but the distinction which arose from the presence of a Native population was to be recognized to the extent of one regiment, on condition that a sum of £50,000, heretofore paid as part of a complicated arrangement into which he need not enter, for Native purposes, should be appropriated to the benefit of the Natives. If the House ultimately sanctioned that arrangement, these advantages would be secured: the whole debt to the Imperial treasury would at once be discharged; an arrangement with regard to the troops furnished by the mother country to the colony fair and reasonable in itself would be substituted for that nominal and inequitable arrangement which had hitherto prevailed; and, lastly, the Colonial Minister engaged on the part of himself and his colleagues, that they would cordially co-operate with the Governor in that policy towards the Natives which had been prescribed to him by the Government at home, and which had met with the approval of that House. The measure, in short, was brought forward in fulfilment of a former pledge, and in the belief that it would contribute to the pacification and settlement of the Northern Island, that it would not entail any risk or expenditure upon the Imperial Treasury, and that it would be the foundation of a more equitable arrangement with regard to the future apportionment of charges between this country and New Zealand. He hoped, therefore, that there would be no opposition to the Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

Mr. AYTOUN said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would allow such a time to elapse before the second reading of the Bill as would give to hon. Members an opportunity of reading the correspondence upon this subject, and that the discussion on the next stage of the measure would be brought forward at an early hour.

Mr. CARDWELL said, that if the Resolution was agreed to that night and reported the following day, he would fix the second reading of the Bill for the following Monday, but he was not sure that he should be able to bring it on on that evening.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he thought the Government were about to undertake a great responsibility in proposing the loan, and the proper time for discussing the proposal was in Committee on the Resolution. He had not had time to read the papers through carefully, but from what he had seen he would warn the House to look carefully into the financial state of New Zealand. He believed that the liabilities of New Zealand were very great. Why should they want a loan of £3,000,000? He wished to know the amount of their outstanding liabilities, for he did not think the New Zealand system of finance was upon a sound basis. He should like to know how the old debts were to be discharged, for respecting some of them squabbles were going on between the Home and the Colonial Governments. He understood that the colony was to pay £44 for each infantry soldier, and £55 for each artilleryman, and he should have thought that the allowance for the infantry and artillery would have absorbed the whole of the surplus income of the colony, leaving no margin to justify a guarantee. The taxpayers of this country ought not to be burdened with these sops to New Zealand.

Mr. WHALLEY said, that he had seen in New Zealand newspapers a statement that Sir George Grey, the Governor of New Zealand, had said that the outbreak had originated and been sustained by the influence of the Roman Catholic priests. He mentioned that in order that the right hon. Gentleman might inform the House whether he had received from Sir George Grey any communication to that effect.

Mr. ADDERLEY said, he was not generally favourable to the guarantee of colonial loans by the Imperial Government, but he thought it must be confessed that the present case of New Zealand was exceptional, and that there were great objects at stake which might induce the House to enter into the proposed guarantee. He wished to know whether the Government were about to give a guarantee for a loan of £3,000,000, or for a loan of £1,000,000, and what the two sums were required for? He thought they should consider the great difficulties of the colony, and that the Government had been so far committed in the creation of them, as in the old vicious system of Downing Street government we initiated the policy which led to them; and also that the colony was entitled to great consideration for the manner in which they had met those difficulties, and the example they had set to the other colonies of a rising spirit of self-defence. But the strongest reason for considering the proposition was, that the right hon. Gentleman informed them that the condition attaching to this guarantee was that the colony would have to pay for all military sent out to them on future occasions, with the exception of a single regiment. It was impossible that this country could go on finding troops for colonies all over the world, and the sooner they found a precedent in the colonies for their paying for the use of English troops the better it would be for both them and for this country. Under these circumstances, without expressing any deliberate opinion on the whole scheme, he was willing to state his strong inclination to support the Government.

MR. HASSARD said, as it was a question entirely turning upon available surplus, it would be desirable, before the second reading, to have some detailed information as to the finances of New Zealand. If 4,000 men were to be paid for at the rate of £40 each, exclusive of artillery, the total of £160,000 thus made would be a very serious item.

MR. CARDWELL said, the surplus in question was paid in after all general expenditure had been satisfied, and as the loan was to be a first charge on the revenues of New Zealand, the whole sum was available as security. It was not expected that it would be necessary to maintain anything like 4,000 troops in New Zealand.

MR. WHALLEY said, he must remind the right hon. Gentleman that he had not answered his question.

MR. CARDWELL said, he really did not think that at that time of night (twenty minutes to one o'clock) he ought to enter on that branch of the question.

Resolved,

That Her Majesty be authorized to guarantee the liquidation of a Loan, to an amount not exceeding One Million Pounds, for the service of the Colony of New Zealand, together with interest thereon not exceeding Four Pounds per Centum per annum; and that provision be made out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for the payment from time to time of such sums of money as may become payable by Her Majesty under such guarantee.

LORD ELGIN AND LORD CANNING.

EXPLANATION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he wished to call the attention of his noble Friend the President of the Council to a statement made by him yesterday evening, which had been misunderstood or misreported not only by one, but by several, of the newspapers of that morning. It was on a point mainly personal, but not wholly devoid of historical importance, and perhaps not without some interest in an official point of view. When his noble Friend was speaking of Lord Elgin's career, and rendering no more than a just tribute to his merits, he referred to that part of his career in which, at Singapore, on his way to China, he agreed to divert and did divert the troops which were then on their way from England to China, in order that they might be sent to India to assist in suppressing the mutiny, and he understood his noble Friend to say that he did so at the urgent request of the Governor General of India, and on his responsibility. Reading the reports, however, he found that his noble Friend was represented to have said that Lord Elgin

Any one who read that report would naturally think that Lord Elgin in diverting the troops under his command to India had acted on an original notion which had occurred to him. Lord Canning had been charged by those who knew nothing of the circumstances of the case with having been the last man to acknowledge the gravity of the revolt; whereas the papers laid before their Lordships showed that Lord Elgin had acted upon a distinct and urgent demand made on him by the Governor General of India. Lord Canning, in fact, wrote to Lord Elgin, asking him to move to India as many regiments as possible at his disposal before sending them on to China, and he concluded thus—

“I place the matter briefly before your Lordship, but I hope clearly enough to enable you to come to a ready decision. I will add that I am willing and anxious to bear the whole responsibility of all the consequences of turning aside the troops from China to India.”

Lord Elgin, in cordially acceding to this request after consultation with General Ashburnham to divert the troops, said—

“In diverting from their destination a portion of the troops under my command, both the General and myself feel that we are incurring a heavy responsibility and are making great sacrifices.”

The merits of Lord Elgin were of so high a character that they did not need enhancement by detracting from the merits of anyone else; and he thought that his noble Friend the Lord President would not hesitate to state distinctly that while Lord Elgin had entered most cordially into the execution of the plan proposed by Lord Canning, the proposition emanated from Lord Canning, and that he emphatically stated that he was willing to take upon himself the whole of the responsibility.

EARL GRANVILLE: I should be one of the last to find fault with the accuracy with which the speeches made here are reported in the newspapers; but if we recollect how often we speak in a conversational kind of tone across this table, and what a noise there is often going on under the reporters' gallery, it is difficult to understand how even the substance of our observations is caught. My noble Friend is quite right in bringing the matter under the attention of your Lordships, because everything that happened at the time referred to is worthy of being correctly recorded. My noble Friend is perfectly correct as to the substance of what I intended to say; I will not answer for the words. What I meant to say was that Lord Elgin on his way out to China was met by the news of the Indian rebellion, and received an urgent appeal from Lord Canning to divert the troops under his command to India, and that Lord Canning took upon himself the entire responsibility of the act. It never occurred to me to detract from the merits of either of these two great and distinguished men—and, indeed, the fact always struck me as a singular instance of the presence of mind with which Lord Canning availed himself of every possible resource at his command in a great emergency. With regard to the responsibility, Lord Canning took upon himself the responsibility of making the request, and Lord Elgin the responsibility of granting it. I think my chief reason for alluding to the circumstance was to remark on the singular coincidence of two college friends, after a separation by political employment for many years, finding themselves meeting in a distant part of the world under such circumstances, and joining cordially in a measure which, if not the turning-point of the rebellion, was at least of the greatest importance in enabling the Governor General to suppress it.

LORD LYVEDEN said, that his noble Friend had certainly been misrepresented by the newspapers, for he had paid particular attention to his speech, having remarked that in the other House both Lord Palmerston and Sir Charles Wood had laid too much stress on Lord Elgin's conduct in this affair, and to a certain extent had detracted from the merit of Lord Canning—though that might be quite unintentional. The Secretary of State said that the reason why part of Lady Elgin's pension was charged on the Indian revenues was that at a critical moment Lord Elgin had diverted the troops from China to India. The memory of Lord Canning did not need any vindication from any one; but when that statement had been made in the House of Commons, it was only right that his noble Friend the President of the Council should have given the explanation which their Lordships had just heard. Lord Canning sent a message to Lord Elgin and General Ashburnham, urging them in a way that did not admit of refusal for troops, and under these circumstances Lord Elgin was entitled to the credit of allowing the troops to be diverted; but the idea had originated entirely with Lord Canning. At the same time he sent to Sir Henry Ward at Ceylon, and a short time after he sent to Sir George Grey at the Cape for similar assistance. Having said so much on that point, while expressing his concurrence in what had been said as to the merits of Lord Elgin, he thought the Government ought to consider whether any portion of the pension to be given to Lady Elgin ought to be charged on the finances of India. No pension had been given to Lady Ward out of the Indian revenues, although Sir Henry Ward died at Madras immediately after his removal from the governorship of Ceylon, from the effects of the climate of India. He was glad to say that Sir George Grey was still performing excellent service for his country; but those two men had sent troops to India as well as Lord Elgin, and it could scarcely be said that the fact of his Lordship having been for a short time Governor General entitled his widow to a pension charged on the finances of India.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, as a very near relation of one of the parties and as a friend of the other, wished to say that he understood the speech of the President of the Council last evening as one which did equal justice to Lord Canning and Lord Elgin. As he had not spoken on the previous occasion their Lordships would allow him to take the opportunity of expressing his satisfaction, and more than satisfaction, at the statement in which his noble Friend the President of the Council had done justice to Lord Elgin and his widow. He had listened with attention to every word which fell from his noble Friend, and he found that the speech of the noble Earl entirely expressed his own feelings on the subject. It was impossible to have heard the recital of the eminent services of Lord Elgin without a feeling of gratification; and it was equally impossible to contemplate the loss the country had sustained by his death without a feeling of the deepest sorrow. He was sure their Lordships all felt grateful to Her Majesty for having given so signal a mark of her appreciation of Lord Elgin's great merits, and for having done justice to an illustrious public servant. It was most satisfactory to find that in a monarchical country such sentiments of gratitude for public services should exist; that those feelings of jealousy which were so often found to prevail in democratic communities had no place here, and that the nation responded to the example given to it by the Crown, and was anxious to do justice to those who deserved well of their country.

SIR ROWLAND HILL, K.C.B.—ADDRESS ON THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE.

Order of the Day for the consideration of the QUEEN'S MESSAGE of the 6th instant read.

MESSAGE read.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, last evening I asked your Lordships to concur in measures to secure a pension to the widow of a distinguished Member of your Lordships' House, who, having entered early into the service of the country, fell full of honours, if not of years, before the nation had reaped all the benefits which his great knowledge and experience would have conferred upon it had he been spared to a more advanced age. To-day I have to make a somewhat similar proposal in favour of one who, having entered comparatively late into the public service, and having served the public faithfully for a quarter of a century, now enjoys the satisfaction of seeing the great scheme of his life carried out with entire success, to the great advantage of this country, and, I may add, of the entire world. We can hardly conceive the progress that has been made in postal development without referring back to the postal history of that time. I cannot doubt that your Lordships will entirely concur with the Report of the Committee which sat twenty-five years ago, to inquire into the measure proposed by Mr. Rowland Hill's penny postal scheme. In that Report it is stated that—

"On the management of the Post Office, and the regulation of the postage rates, depends in a great measure the entire correspondence of the country, and in that correspondence is involved whatever affects, interests, or agitates mankind—private interests, public interests, family, kindred, friends, commercial interests, professional business, literature, science, art, law, politics, education, morals, religion."

They reported on the almost universal evasion of the postage. It was shown that in some of our commercial districts five-sixths and four-fifths of the letters were sent in violation of the law. In some towns only one letter in fifty went through the post office. All over the country the law was systematically violated in the transmission of letters. They found that the system which then existed pressed with peculiar hardship upon the poorer classes in this country. Sir Rowland Hill then brought forward his scheme. I am aware that there is some dispute as to who was the first person to propose the scheme of a penny postage; but every one must acknowledge that, if not quite the foremost, Sir Rowland Hill was one of the foremost in advocating that plan. He was certainly assisted in it by various persons and bodies. Mr. Wallace took an active share in forwarding it. The Chambers of Commerce took an active share, and especially the London Mercantile Committee, of which Lord Overstone was a distinguished member, and which issued papers on the subject marked by great activity and ability. But, whatever were the merits of this advocacy, we are accustomed in this country to ascribe the real credit of any reform to the energy, and industry, and determination of the men who practically carry it out. Great credit is due to the noble Marquess behind me (the Marquess of Clanricarde) for the appointment of Sir Rowland Hill to a position in the Post Office which enabled him to carry out his scheme—for your Lordships must not forget that, however successful the penny postal system may now be, it was much opposed at that time, and Sir Rowland Hill was looked upon as a rash schemer and innovator. But the result of his innovation has been entirely satisfactory, and the number of letters which pass through the post is now nine times what it was twenty-five years ago. It is not only in England, too, that communication by letter has vastly increased. In the colonies there has also been a great increase; and the example set in this country has been followed to a certain extent by every civilized nation. But the scheme for the penny postage does not embrace the whole of the postal reforms introduced by Sir Rowland Hill. By developing the book post he has conferred a great boon on literature, and has given a great impetus to education, while the money order system has given immense facilities for the transmission of money from one part of the kingdom to the other, and has assumed extraordinary proportions. Here are some statistics which will show your Lordships what has been the development of the postal system. In 1838, before the penny postal system, the total number of letters which passed through the Post Office was 76,000,000; in 1863 the number was 642,000,000. In 1838 the amount of money orders was £313,000; in 1863 it amounted to £16,494,000. My Lords, I think I have stated enough to show that one who has accomplished so much for the people of this country, and for mankind at large, is entitled to some national reward; and I am sure your Lordships will pass this Vote with the same cordiality with which you yesterday evinced your sense of the merits of another public servant. The noble Earl concluded with his Motion.

Moved,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to return Her Majesty the Thanks of this House for Her Majesty's most gracious Message informing this House ‘That Her Majesty, taking into consideration the eminent Services of Sir Rowland Hill, K.C.B., late Secretary to the General Post Office, in devising and carrying out important improvements in Postal Administration, is desirous, in recognition of such Services, to confer some signal Mark of Her Favour upon him;’ and to assure Her Majesty that this House will cheerfully concur in such Measures as may be necessary for the Accomplishment of this Purpose.”—(The Lord President.)

LORD BROUGHAM said, he desired to express his entire approval of the Motion. There was this peculiarity in Sir Rowland Hill—that whereas inventors in general were the most sanguine of men who saw no difficulties in the way, and who exaggerated the probable results of their invention, he under-stated the value of his invention and over-estimated the difficulties and the expense of adopting it. He calculated that from the adoption of his scheme there would be a loss of £300,000, instead of which the gross increase of revenue had been £1,700,000; and after deducting £500,000 for the packet service and all other expenses, there was a clear net increase of £1,000,000. He agreed with his valued friend the late Lord Ashburton, that the carriage of letters was not a proper subject of revenue at all. With regard to the proposal now before the House, he could not doubt that their Lordships would be of opinion that Sir Rowland Hill well deserved the reward which was to be bestowed on him.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE had the satisfaction of remembering that being then Postmaster General it was under him and through him in some degree that Sir Rowland Hill had entered the Post Office, and he felt bound to bear testimony to the extraordinary zeal for the public service, the judgment, the discretion, the temper, and unvarying urbanity with which he met all the difficulties that he had to encounter. Of course those who had been accustomed to the old system viewed the innovation proposed with great alarm and suspicion. He attributed no blame to these officers, believing that the opinions given by them against the new system were founded upon very natural fears and bias. As their Lordships were aware, the plan, on the contrary, proved eminently successful, and that success was owing in a great degree to the energetic perseverance of Sir Rowland Hill. But penny postage, as his noble Friend had said, was not the only improvement for which the nation had to thank Sir Rowland Hill. His belief was, that if it had not been for Sir Rowland Hill the business in the Money Order Office would not have reached to one-sixteenth of its present proportions—he doubted, indeed, whether that business would have been carried on any longer. No balance had been struck, and no one could tell what assets were in hand. He then asked Mr. Hill, who at that time had introduced some important improvements in the circulation of letters, to take this subject in hand. The result of that gentleman's efforts was to establish, if not an exact balance, at least what practically amounted to it; the system was materially altered, and instead of eleven entries for every money order the number was reduced to four or five, and since that time he had heard of no defalcation or fraud on the part of postmasters, such as had frequently occurred before that time. There could be no question whatever that the system had been productive of immense benefit to the lower and the humbler portions of the middle classes. During the time that he had the honour to be connected with the Post Office he always found that Sir Rowland Hill laboured zealously and efficiently, and always to his satisfaction. When objections to his plans were raised, Sir Rowland Hill always received them in a fair and temperate manner, and never complained of being overruled when fair grounds for so doing had been shown. Upon the whole, this country had never rewarded by a grant of money any public servant who more richly deserved it. Sir Rowland Hill's name would live in every country, for every country had derived benefit from his labours.

Motion agreed to.

Address Ordered, Nemine Dissentiente, to be presented to Her Majesty, to return Her Majesty the Thanks of this House for Her Majesty's most gracious Message informing this House,

"That Her Majesty, taking into consideration the eminent Services of Sir Rowland Hill, K.C.B., late Secretary to the General Post Office, in devising and carrying out important Improvements in Postal Administration, is desirous, in recognition of such Services, to confer some signal Mark of Her Favour upon him;" and to assure Her Majesty that this House will cheerfully concur in such Measures as may be necessary for the Accomplishment of this Purpose."

And the said Address was Ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

MORTGAGE DEBENTURES BILL.

(NO. 107.) REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY, on behalf of the Duke of Marlborough, moved the insertion of a new clause, providing that in cases where, by the instrument creating the trust, trustees are expressly authorized to invest the trust money upon the security of land or real property, they or the major part of them may apply to the Court of Chancery in England or Ireland, or to the Court of Session in Scotland, for an order or declaration of the Court empowering the trustees to invest any monies subject to the trust upon the security of mortgage debentures issued under this Act.

After a short discussion, Amendment negatived.

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee on this Bill read.

THE BISHOP of OXFORD said, that his right rev. Brother the Bishop of Exeter, who had given notice of a Motion, on going into Committee on this Bill, to move that a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report on the Modes of Appeal proposed in the 83rd, 84th, and 85th sections of the Bill, had requested him to state to their Lordships that he had become so exhausted in his efforts to come to and remain in the House, that he could not stay until this Bill was brought on. But as the most rev. Primate of Ireland had intimated his intention not to proceed with the clauses which were objected to that night, he (the Bishop of Oxford) would not move the Amendment of his right rev. Brother; and he would take that opportunity of stating that he would withdraw the Amendment of which he had himself given notice, and leave the matter in the hands of the most rev. Prelate.

House in Committee.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF ARMAGH moved to omit Clauses 83, 84, and 85.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that although he thought that the most rev. Prelate had taken a prudent course in consenting to the rejection of these clauses, which related to the question of the final appeal in matters of doctrine, when he found that, from the state of feeling in the House with regard to them, to press them would endanger the safety of the Bill, it was a matter very much to be regretted that it was rendered necessary to give them up. The Court of Final Appeal in Ireland at present was the Court of Delegates, which he was informed consisted of three Puisne Judges and a certain number of civilians. Now, in Ireland, there were nine Puisne Judges, six of whom were now Roman Catholics, so that practically there were only three Judges who could be members of this court. Of the remaining persons, namely, the civilians, he doubted if there were any who were well qualified to undertake this sort of duty. With regard to the alternative, namely, the Judicial Committee (of the English Privy Council) he would not undertake to say whether it was a satisfactory tribunal or not, but what he wished were two separate Courts of Final Appeal, this uniformity could be made certain. At the same time, as he said before, he thought that the most rev. Prelate had exercised a wise discretion in now yielding this point, which might be more successfully brought forward another day, rather than risk the safety of this very important measure.

Clauses struck out.

Report of the Amendments to be received on Friday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 132.)

FACTORY ACTS EXTENSION BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill. It had been introduced in consequence and percussion caps, paper-staining, finishing and hooking, and fustian cutting. The recommendations of the Commissioners resolved themselves into three heads—that the places in which those manufactures were carried on should be properly cleansed and effectually ventilated; that special means should be provided for alleviating the peculiar dangers arising from such of the processes employed as were unusually noxious and dangerous; and that the provisions of the Factory Acts should be enforced with reference to those manufactures and employments. The number of children employed in those trades was between 17,000 and 18,000, and he was the more desirous of stating that fact as the hon. Member for Devonport (Mr. Ferrand) had computed them at 100,000. Although it was possible, in case the House should assent to the principle of the Bill, that ultimately a much larger number of children than he had mentioned would be affected by similar legislation, yet, as a matter of fact, the number of children and young persons who would be immediately affected by the Bill was between 17,000 and 18,000. That number might be divided as follows:—11,000 were employed in the potteries, 1,613 in the lucifer-match manufactories, 150 in the manufacture of percussion caps, 1,150 in paper-staining, 2,300 in finishing and hooking, and 1,563 in fustian cutting. The Bill before the House embodied all the recommendations of the Commissioners in its clauses. It first of all provided that the places in which those trades were carried on should be painted in oil once in seven years, and lime-washed once in fourteen months. The only deviations from the recommendations of the Commissioners were to be found in the following provisions:—

“(1.) During the first six months after the passing of the Act children not under eleven to be employed as young persons. (2.) During the first thirty months children not under twelve may be employed as young persons. (3.) No child, young person, or woman employed in lucifer-match manufactory to take meals in any part of the factory where the manufacturing process is carried on. (4.) No child to be employed in fustian cutting before eleven years of age. (5.) During the first eighteen months after the passing of the Act, so much of the Factory Acts as provide that no child, young person, or woman shall take meals in any part of the factory where the manufacturing process is carried on shall not apply to the employment of paper-staining or the manufacture of earthenware.”

In addition to the provisions contained in the Bill with regard to ventilation and cleanliness, the master was empowered to make special rules in order to secure those desirable objects, and summarily to punish any workmen who should set them at defiance. This provision would remove the only objection he had heard made to this clause, which was one that the masters regarded as essential to their security. The Factory Acts had been incorporated in the present measure with a few exceptions, and those exceptions had been made with the object of rendering the transition from the present state of things easier and more convenient than it otherwise would have been. He would not enter upon the general question of the propriety of legislative interference for the protection of women and children against excessive or unhealthy labour, because that question had been fully discussed on the first introduction of the Factory Acts, and those who were most opposed to those measures at the time of their introduction—and among the number were not only employers of labour, but many statesmen—distinguished as much for philanthropy as for their political ability—had now been forced to admit the wisdom of those Acts of the Legislature. There was not one hon. Member who took part in those debates, he believed, and who opposed the introduction of the Factory Acts, who did not now admit that he was wrong—and the Factory Acts so far from having proved an evil had been a great blessing. He, nevertheless, confessed that, in spite of the success which had attended the introduction of those Acts, the Government was bound in all cases to assign sufficient reason to warrant its interference, and in doing so he was fortunately spared the necessity of using much argument. In a memorial which had been presented to the Government from the employers in the Potteries the memorialists, after stating various facts with reference to the health and education of children in the Potteries, said that their employment was the cause of various moral and physical evils; that it was the origin of a vast amount of ignorance; that the employment of children at so tender an age stunted their growth, and caused in many cases a tendency to consumption, distortion of the spine, and other complaints; and that, much as they deplored these evils, it would not be possible to prevent them by any scheme of agreement between the manufacturers, as a portion only of the employers could be brought to consent to such an agreement. The memorialists also urged the desirableness of appointing a Commission to inquire into the subject, and to consult as to the best means of remedying the evils complained of. The memorial was most creditable to those who had signed it, and it was perhaps the first instance in which an agitation for the security and advantage of the working people against excessive hours and labour had been initiated by the masters themselves. He should have been quite contented to allow his case to rest upon the evidence of the memorialists, had not the correctness of their statements been lately called into question. He therefore felt it his duty to lay before the House reasons for believing that the memorialists were fully justified in what they said, and that there was every cause why Government should interfere. In the Potteries the number of young persons employed between the ages of thirteen and eighteen was 6,500, and the number of children between eight and twelve was 4,500. A great many children commenced work when they were eight years of age, and they were at once put to labour which, under the best masters, generally lasted for eleven or twelve hours, and under the worst was sometimes extended to thirteen or fourteen. A large number of the children were employed in turning the "jigger"—an operation not requiring much strength, but which overtasked the strength of children when continued throughout the day—and in "mould-running." Children were rarely employed at the first only. They varied their work of jigger-turning by carrying the clay which had been moulded into a hot stove, where the temperature was often between 120 and 130 degrees. He did not regard that portion of the work as severe, even if the child were so young as eight, provided that the hours of labour were limited, but he was aware that difference of opinion existed upon the point. The process termed "wedging clay" was chiefly performed by boys, and involved an amount of continuous exertion much beyond their strength. In reference to the processes of "dipping" and "scouring" the Government Inspector said—

"The operation of dipping the ware is a specially injurious employment, owing to the poisonous nature of the lead which generally forms a large ingredient in the glaze. Boys of a very young age are employed in carrying the ware to the dipper, and are thus compelled to spend much of their time in the poisoned atmosphere of the dipping house. The injurious effects of the dipping tub are well known. Few dippers continue many years at their work without suffering from painter's colic or paralysis; many become crippled at an early age. Boys of about fourteen or fifteen years of age are employed to 'gather' the ware from the dipper; they are brought more in contact with the glaze than the other boys. Women are also employed in the dipping house to brush the ware. Nearly all the boys whom I found engaged in this work had felt its effects more or less; some had suffered very seriously. There seems to be ground for supposing that some constitutions are more affected by the lead poison than others. The boys employed in the dipping house are generally a better class than the flatpressers' assistants. Their wages are much higher and the work is less laborious. . . . The operation of scouring china—i. e. dusting and cleaning the ware from the fine flint powder in which it has been fired, is a very injurious employment. The persons engaged in this work are women. No children are ever employed in it, but many young women are tempted to sacrifice their health for the high wages which this employment affords."

The paper cutters were mostly children. In the operation itself there was little that was injurious, but the health of the children suffered in consequence of over work, the great heat of the room in which the labour was carried on, and from deficient ventilation. With respect to the health of the potters, Dr. Greenhow said, in 1861, in his Report on Public Health—

"The potters of Stoke and Wolstanton are of short stature and sickly appearance. . . . Boys are put to work at a very early age. Boys were observed carrying recently made ware into the stoves at the age of seven, and at all intermediate ages between seven and fourteen years. . . . Young females were seen turning the jigger at the ages of twelve and thirteen years, and sometimes, but rarely, at an earlier age. . . . It was stated by Mr. Boothroyd, a medical practitioner of Hanley, that each successive generation of potters became more dwarfed and less robust than the preceding one, and that, in his opinion, but for their occasional intermarriage with strangers, the deterioration would follow much more rapidly. This statement was confirmed by Mr. M'Bean, another medical man, who said that he had observed a marked degeneration in the potters, especially shown in a diminution of stature and breadth, since he commenced practice among them twenty-five years ago. This falling off he attributed greatly to the neglect of children by their mothers, but more especially to the early age at which they are put to labour, and to the unhealthiness of their parents."

Dr. J. T. Arlidge, senior physician to the North Staffordshire Infirmary, expressed himself in even stronger terms—

"The potters, as a class, both men and women, but more especially the former, represent a degenerated population, both physically and morally. They are, as a rule, stunted in growth, ill-shaped, and frequently ill-formed in the chest; they become prematurely old, and are certainly short-lived; they are phlegmatic and bloodless, and exhibit their debility of constitution by obstinate attacks of dyspepsia and disorders of the liver and kidneys, and by rheumatism. But of all diseases they are especially prone to chest disease, to pneumonia, phthisis, bronchitis, and asthma. One form would appear peculiar to them, and is known as 'potter's asthma' or 'potter's consumption.' Scrofula, attacking the glands or bones or other parts of the body, is a disease of two-thirds or more of the potters. The men are more subject to chest disease than the women; the latter employed in 'dipping' and in 'printing' suffer most. Those engaged in painting, burnishing, and in the ware-rooms least. The most sickly men are the hollow-ware pressers, firemen, and dippers. That the 'degenerescence' of the population of this district is not even greater than it is, is due to the constant recruiting from the adjacent country and to inter-marriages with more healthy races."

Those statements, however, having been the subject of much discussion, he would fortify them by independent evidence which fully sustained their general accuracy. From a Return which had been made to Parliament it appeared that certain districts of Northumberland were the most healthy in England. A comparison between the deaths from phthisis and other diseases of the chest between the ages of twenty-five and forty-five showed that at Stoke-upon-Trent there died from those diseases 584 men and 542 women per 100,000 living; in Northumberland, 335 men and 406 women; and in England and Wales, 512 men and 518 women. Between the ages of forty-five and fifty-five the deaths among the male population at Stoke-upon-Trent had increased to 1,309; and among the female population it remained stationary. In Northumberland there were 322 deaths among the men, and 361 among the women; while in England and Wales the numbers were 692 and 518 respectively. Between the ages of fifty-five and sixty-five the number of men who died from diseases of the lungs had increased at Stoke-upon-Trent to 1,787, and of women, to 882; while the numbers in Northumberland were 477 and 407, and in England and Wales 995 and 741. The result of the Commissioners' Report showed that employment in the Pottery manufactures undermined the constitution and encouraged and propagated forms of disease most productive of human suffering, and ultimately of decay. So much for the health. Now, with respect to education. The inquiry of the Commission showed that education was very backward. In 1841 the population of the whole of the Pottery district was 70,000, and out of that number there were only 1,712 day scholars, or a proportion of 2·4 per cent. In 1862 the state of things was considerably improved, because while the population had increased to 80,237, the day scholars had also increased to 5,450, or about 6·7 per cent. Mr. Longe gave as the results of his personal examination of the children among the flat-pressers and lower classes of workmen:—

No. of		Children Examined.	Could read.	Could not read.

Statistics on the subject had been prepared in the Education Department, which would enable the House to judge of the difference between the state of education in the district to which he referred, and in districts in which the Factory Acts were in operation. In making a comparison between three districts where there was no compulsory legislation with three factory towns, he found that in Newcastle, Stoke-on-Trent, and Wolstanton, the percentage of children at schools receiving the grant amounted to 7·89 above ten years, and 5·12 above twelve. In Halifax, Bradford, and Rochdale, the numbers were 17 per cent above ten, and 12 per cent above twelve. So that in spite of the desire of the parents to have their children educated, and of the masters to provide schools, the state of education in the Pottery districts was very unsatisfactory. It was urged by some that the educational clauses of the Mines Regulation Act would have the desired effect; but the success of that experiment in legislation had not hitherto been encouraging. It had certainly discouraged the employment of children underground between the ages of ten and twelve, but it seemed to have failed almost wholly in one of its chief objects, namely, in securing for them a certain amount of education. The recent Report of the Committee of Council on Education contained several notices of its operation in the principal Mining districts. Of their effect in Lancashire, Mr. Kennedy said—

"I have reason to fear that, as a rule, this law is of little practical effect in Lancashire, from three causes:—1st, because the expression 'competent schoolmaster' admits of a wide application; 2nd, because the expression 'able to read and write' is also susceptible of loose interpretation; and 3rd, because the supervision of the working of the clause is not, and probably cannot, be rigidly carried out. The result is that the educational provisions have not had much effect in Lancashire."

Mr. Moncrieff thus spoke of the results in Northumberland—

"Wherever I have had the opportunity in colliery schools I have inquired whether the Mines Regulation Act of 1860 has had any perceptible influence in raising the age of scholars' attendance, i.e. in promoting the attendance of boys between ten and twelve. The answer, both from schoolmasters and from owners or viewers, has, I believe, invariably been in the negative. I believe the provisions of the Act are fairly carried out, but I am not aware of any instances of boys attending school and receiving the certificate required. Viewers would rather dispense with them altogether than have the trouble of looking after the certificates. It does not, however, I am sorry to say, follow, that because they do not go down the pit they are therefore at school. Other employment, not within the scope of the Act, is found for them, so that nothing is commoner than to be assured that there are no boys of that age in the pit, and to see, on the other hand, that there are hardly any of them in school."

Mr. Norris said, that in Staffordshire—

"The Mines Act of 1860, so far as its educational provisions are concerned, has been a complete failure in the mining districts of Staffordshire and Shropshire."

Of their working in the West Riding of Yorkshire, Mr. Watkins said—

"Judging by the schools which I have inspected in the mining districts, and by information obtained from their teachers and managers, there seems to be no doubt that the Act has produced some, but hitherto only a slight, effect. I proceed to state the reasons which, in the opinion of many persons well qualified to judge, have hindered and defeated the object of the Act. With regard to the education of children working in mines, the Act provides that a boy above the age of ten years and under the age of twelve years may be employed in a mine or colliery, if he obtains a certificate, under the hand of a competent schoolmaster, that he is able to read and write. These expressions open a wide door for abuse. The term 'competent schoolmaster' is very vague. Under this nomenclature, any schoolmaster teaching any kind of school may give the certificate required. Possibly there is no schoolmaster who is actually unable to tell whether a boy can read or write. But there is no doubt of the fact that boys obtain their certificates whose reading and writing, if they can be so called, are of the most wretched character, and perfectly useless for the purpose of education. Without some arrangements for a really 'competent master' and some settled test of ability to read and write, the object of the Act will be defeated, not only by dishonest persons, but by those who believe that they are carrying out the point when they keep within the letter of the law."

Against the half-time system proposed by the Bill, it had been urged by the masters, and even by the men themselves, that it would be impossible to obtain the necessary supply of children to carry on the work of factories. Undoubtedly a great number of workmen had petitioned against the application of the Factory Act to the district, but those workmen were themselves the employers of the boys, and generally less inclined to employ the boys moderately and humanely than the masters. A complete answer to the objection was the fact that, in Glasgow and Newcastle, machinery had been employed to supersede the labour of children in some portions of the work. Much of the overwork of the children arose from the practice of many of the potters in working irregularly, or not at all, at the beginning of the week, and making up the time by extra exertion—longer days, towards the end of the week—a practice which created a greater demand for the labour of children than would have existed had they worked regularly. On that point the Commissioners said—

Mr. H. A. Bruce

"If the master's propensities prompt him to loiter away the earlier days of the week, he works the extra hours on middle days to make up his losses. Thus the child—the almost infant child—is taxed with three or four hours' increased exertion, to the sacrifice of his health, his morals, and every domestic comfort that he would otherwise enjoy, and this without the least remuneration, as in every case his wages are the same, whether he makes the twelve hours or the sixteen. The evil is lamented by the honest workman, by the children, by the parents, and universally by the manufacturers, who acknowledge their inability to correct it themselves without incurring the risk of exciting tumult, and thereby occasioning some delay in the execution of their orders, as the processes are so linked in with each other that by losing one set of men the others are rendered useless."

At present a large number of the more respectable persons engaged in the Potteries declined to allow their children to be exposed to the danger and fatigue which they knew to be inseparable from some portions of the business, and consequently a large proportion of the children who worked in the Potteries were drawn from the neighbourhood of collieries, and from amongst the children of the poorer classes. They had the strongest evidence that if the work was made more healthy, a larger number of the children of the potters themselves would be employed, and by that means an ample supply of children would in a short time be obtained. An argument that had been used was, that the works in which the children were employed were so numerous and detached that it might be difficult to enforce the law. That matter had been considered. The same state of things existed in the cotton and woollen manufacturing districts, but no difficulty whatever in practice had resulted from the application of the Acts in those districts. Another argument used was one which was stale in the ears of the House, and it was that the unexpected receipt of orders made it necessary at times to work for a greater number of hours than the Factory Acts permitted. That argument had been too often refuted by experience to have much weight with hon. Members. It was also said that the competition of the iron works and collieries drew off a great number of boys who would otherwise be employed in the Potteries. But in the cotton, linen, and woollen manufacturing districts, which were surrounded by iron works and collieries, no difficulty was experienced in obtaining labour, and the House might rest assured that wherever the children were employed under healthy conditions, the supply would be sufficient.

The strongest objection to the application of the half-time system, and one which would probably receive more sympathy on the part of that House, was, that the age of eight was too early an age at which to employ children even under the restrictions imposed by the Factory Acts. He was bound to say that there was a strong feeling throughout the district against employing children at so early an age; but the experience of Inspectors was that, with very rare exceptions, the employment of children of that age, under the restrictions of the Factory Acts, was not followed by any evil effects upon their health. If the permission to employ children at the age of eight might be to a certain extent an evil, it was also an advantage, because it was a security for the education of the child. The parents were apt to postpone sending the child to school until he began work, and there was no doubt that was an evil which would be augmented if the age of commencing work was altered from eight to nine years. That was a matter, however, which could be more conveniently dealt with in Committee.

He would next state a few facts with respect to another manufacture which would be included in the measure—the manufacture of lucifer matches. It was of recent growth, having only been commenced in the year 1833. The total number of young persons engaged in it was 1,800 and of adults 850;

in other words, about two-thirds of the persons employed in the trade were children or young persons. The evidence taken before the Commission showed that these children were frequently employed from six in the morning till nine or ten o'clock at night, that they were the most neglected and worst educated of any class, and that they were the poorest of the poor and the lowest of the low. Their employment was exceedingly prejudicial to health, and induced a most distressing and painful disease of the jaw. They often lost portions of the jaw, and in some cases the lower jaw was entirely destroyed. The effect of attention having been directed to the matter had been to diminish the evil, but still the application of the Bill would be of the greatest use not only in limiting the number of hours during which the child was exposed to the fumes of phosphorus, but in securing ventilation, and preventing the children having their meals where they would still inhale the fumes of the phosphorus. The next trade—that of percussion caps and cartridges—did not employ many children, but it varied from time to time, and the Commissioners saw no reason why the children should not be included in the Act, their circumstances being generally the same. The next trade was that of paper-staining, the principal seat of which was in London, but it was also carried on in Manchester and other large towns. The number of children employed was 1,100, of which 643 were children under thirteen, and 82 were under ten years of age, and 507 were young persons. The trade was not necessarily injurious in itself, but the hours of labour were excessive. There were a certain number of busy months in the year in the trade, and in four of the busiest of these months the work went on from six in the morning till nine or ten at night, and even later, with little intermission. The effect of these long hours of work had been described by various witnesses. One witness stated that last winter six out of nineteen were away from ill-health from overwork. Mr. Duffy, a workman, stated that he had seen the children when none of them could keep their eyes open to do the work, and a boy thirteen years of age stated that he was kept so long on his feet working that they became sore. The workpeople also suffered from the heat and the fine dust which was suspended in the air during the progress of the work. With respect to the next trade, that of finishing, hooking, and lapping, the House had had the subject frequently before them in connection with the Bleaching and Dyeing Works' Act. It was believed, both by the Inspectors and the majority of manufacturers, that the finishers had been included in the Act. A case, however, having been brought before the Court of Common Pleas, it was decided that where finishing was carried on as a separate process it did not come under the Act. An Act passed in last Session partially removed that evil. Upon the statement of facts furnished by the Commissioners the Government had no difficulty in including the finishers and hookers in the Bill. Numerous objections were, however, made from various towns. First, from Bradford, where about 1,500 persons were employed. A petition signed by 1,108 was presented, stating that there were no children employed in the trade, only young persons; and that the trade so far from being unhealthy, was very healthy; they, therefore, objected very strongly to being placed under the Act. Similar statements came from Belfast, Dundee, and Leeds. It therefore appeared to the Government, that as only inquiry had been made at Manchester, and that as children were not employed in other towns, it would not be expedient to include them within the Act until further inquiry had been made. The Commissioners were about to report upon other trades, and the Government might probably have to introduce another Bill similar to that they were considering. In the meantime inquiry could be made into the condition of hookers, finishers, &c., in other districts; and if the statement with respect to Manchester should be supported as regarded other places, it would then be the duty of Government to insert in another Bill the clause which had been introduced into the Bill before the House, and which he now proposed to omit. And now he came to the last part of his statement, the fustian cutters. In that trade there were altogether about 4,000 persons employed, 1,560 of whom were children, and out of this number about 600 carried on their employment in private dwellings. The tendency was to increase the number of children employed. In some cases they began as early as seven and eight years of age, and the average hours were fourteen per day, with one and a half hour for meals. Some employers, however, towards the end of the week kept them at work for eighteen or twenty hours a day. The nature of the trade, it appeared, necessitated a peculiar action of the body, which threw its weight in one continuous direction, producing in many cases distortion of the knee and spine. There was a general desire on the part of both employers and employed that the Act should be applied to that industry. The difficulty lay in extending it to the private dwellings of the workmen, but that difficulty was not insuperable. Having now concluded his review of the trades affected by the Bill, he felt it his duty to direct the attention of the House to the great importance of the new principles involved in it. Not only was this the first time that the Factory Acts had been applied to trades in which the motive power was not steam, water, or machinery, but the Bill, if passed into a law, would regulate one trade at least which was carried on in private houses. It was the duty of the House carefully to consider the measure, and to determine whether they would be justified in applying the principle of the Factory Acts to the trades he had named. For his own part, he believed that no other species of legislation which human wit had recommended would be so effectual in attaining the end they had in view as those Acts of which they had had so beneficial an experience during the last twenty years.

Mr. CRUM-EWING said, that knowing the beneficial effect the Factory Act had had, he hailed with satisfaction the introduction of the Bill, and it was with considerable regret that he heard a few days back, that the right hon. Gentleman had determined to exclude from its operation the hookers, lappers, and finishers. The whole of the evidence taken by the Commissioners was in favour of including those classes within the operation of the Act, and he trusted the Government would not exclude them, and that they would not flinch from pressing the Bill forward.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. H. A. Bruce.)

VISCOUNT INGESTRE said, he should not oppose the second reading, but he should at the proper time move that it be referred to a Select Committee, with power to send for persons, papers, and records. He wished to put his opposition—if he might use the term—in the mildest form, for he was convinced that in the Potteries something must be done, but the question in his mind was how it should be done. He could not agree to the half-time system, believing that children should not be employed in the Potteries at all under the age of ten years, and that was the prayer of the memorial, already referred to, of the masters in the Potteries. He held in his hand several letters from influential persons favouring the view that children should not be employed under the age of ten years. The feeling was that there should be even very strong restrictions, but the manufacturers asked that the Factory Acts should not be forced upon them, inasmuch as they were inapplicable to the Staffordshire Potteries. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman hardly gave the inhabitants of the Pottery districts sufficient credit for the state of education. The information upon the subject was gathered in a hasty manner, and Mr. Sandford, the Assistant Inspector of Schools, had since acknowledged that he was mistaken in the opinion which he had given upon the subject. In that statement he was supported by the opinion of several schoolmasters in the district, who were all opposed to the half-time system.

Mr. H. R. GRENFELL said, that he would very briefly express the reasons which induced him to vote for the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for North Staffordshire. He could assure his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Committee of Council that he was not going to oppose his measure from any reasons of abstract political economy, but solely from a belief that no arguments had yet been adduced to show that the Mines and Collieries Regulation Act might not be applied to the Pottery district. His right hon. Friend said in his speech that various petitions had reached him since the publication of the blue-book at variance with the original memorial of the manufacturers. He (Mr. Grenfell) could assure the House that such was not the case. The petitions were exactly in accordance with the original memorial, and disputed none of its facts. But they disputed many of the facts contained in the blue-book both as to the health of the district and as to the education. The noble Lord having already shown that the educational statistics in the blue-book were not to be relied on, it was unnecessary for him (Mr. Grenfell) to speak further on that point. But he might say that these errors had caused great uneasiness in the district from the fact that they proceeded from Government agents. The Rev. Mr. Sandford was a Government Inspector of schools, and with regard to the statement of Dr. Arlidge on the health of the district, he had among his papers a pamphlet, published by a sub-Inspector of factories, Mr. Measor, who took for granted that Dr. Arlidge's statement was true. His right hon. Friend had himself quoted it, and it appeared as a test for almost every paper and pamphlet that had appeared since the publication of the blue-book. Now what were the facts of the case? Dr. Arlidge's statement was so astounding that almost every one connected with the district took notice of it, and having himself been present at several meetings in the district, called for the purpose of discussing the Government measure, and hearing so much of Dr. Arlidge's statement, he thought there must be some mistake in it. Through the kindness of a friend he was put in communication with Dr. Arlidge, who very politely sent him a letter of explanation, which, with the permission of the House, he would read—

"Newcastle-under-Lyme,
February 17th, 1864.

"Dear Sir,—My friend Mr. Blakiston, of Shelton, has kindly suggested that it would be well for me to write you in reply to a question put to him in a recent letter of yours, respecting the scope of my letter published in the report of the Children's Employment Commission, p. 24. I gladly avail myself of the suggestion, as my remarks have been much misinterpreted and severely censured.

"Paragraph 2 has been set forward by itself, and discussed without reference to the explanations contained in paragraph 1, and I have been made to say that the defects noted in paragraph 2 apply to the whole population of the Potteries. This interpretation is unfair. My assertions, as intimated in the first section, rest upon observations made among sick people almost entirely, and carried on principally at the Infirmary. At the same time this institution offers the best possible field for noting the prevalent disorders of the artisans of the district, and were I again asked my opinion of the physical condition of the working potters, I should reiterate the statements in my published letter, with very slight modifications. The word "mentally" crept into my letter without reflection, and I would not repeat it unless convinced by special research of the truth of deterioration of mental condition, over and above that amount inevitably concomitant with physical deterioration.

"Then, again, I would not assert that two-thirds of the potters are scrofulous, though probably one-third are. In so saying I was influenced by the vast number of strumous patients which fell under my observation at the date I wrote, at the Infirmary, and from what I then knew I was justified in making the assertion. That so many scrofulous cases fell to my lot at that time was the result of the usage prevailing, to send such cases to the physicians. It would lead me beyond the limits of a letter to enter into further explanations of similar accidental modifying circumstances to be allowed for in a fair estimate of my letter. Saving, however, the two points mentioned, I repeat, my letter conveys the positive results of observation carried on among the potters applying at the Infirmary, and as far as practicable, among those coming within the range of private practice. It should be remembered that by the plan of 'establishment subscriptions,' levied as a tax among the work-people, the Infirmary represents a gigantic sick club, and therefore the results arrived at respecting the physical condition of the artisans of the district, are of wider application than they would be in an Infirmary supported wholly by voluntary contributions, and therefore resorted to by the very poor only. Forgive this long epistle.—I remain, yours truly,

"J. T. ARLIDGE.

"H. R. Grenfell, Esq."

P.S.—I have a multitude of statistics which I hope shortly to publish.—J. T. A.

What, then, was the upshot of this piece of evidence as to two-thirds of the potters being scrofulous? Why that two-thirds of those who went to Dr. Arlidge were so. And this, because those afflicted with this disorder were sent to the physician, and he was a physician. After such a piece of evidence as that, no wonder doubt was thrown upon the accuracy of these statements. Passing from the evidence to the measure before the House, he confessed he had heard no reason as yet why the three first clauses of the Mines Regulation Act should not be applied instead of the half-time clauses of the Factory Act. It was the unanimous feeling of the manufacturers and workmen that such should be attempted. The whole of the clergy were in favour of it, and, indeed, he might say that the Rector of Stoke only a few days ago assured him (Mr. Grenfell) that he considered it better for the health and more conducive to the education of the district. For these reasons he should support the Motion of the noble Lord for a Committee, which, he was informed, need only last a few days, as the object was clearly defined and the evidence could be easily sifted. At the same time, whether this were granted or not, he felt convinced that the manufacturers of the Pottery district were desirous of obtaining the best measure for the workmen, and that whichever measure of these two was selected by Parliament, in the wisdom of which they had the fullest confidence—whether it were the half-time system or the Mines Act—they would receive it with the full intention to do their utmost to make it conducive to the health, morals, and education of this important district.

MR. ALDERMAN COPELAND said, he should like to see the Bill so modified that it could be advantageously applied. He desired, and his brother manufacturers concurred in that desire, to see an enactment passed prohibiting the employment of any child before the age of ten years, and then for not more than seven and a half hours a day. He maintained that the blue-book had cast a stigma upon the Staffordshire manufacturers which they could ill bear. He believed that it would be very advisable if the provisions of the Mines Regulations Act could be applied to the Pottery districts. He must also take the opportunity of congratulating the right hon. Gentleman upon the selection he had made in the appointment of mining Inspectors.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he rose to express his gratitude to the right hon. Gentleman for the care and trouble which he had bestowed upon the Bill. The pottery manufacturers of Staffordshire were constituents of whom he might justly be proud. So anxious were they that their trade should not be carried on to the moral or physical injury of those they employed, that they were the first body of manufacturers who had themselves sought to inflict this restrictive legislation on their trade. He (Mr. Adderley) hoped the second reading of the Bill would be passed without discussion, and the sense of the House taken on the proposition of his noble Friend for referring the Bill to a Select Committee. He thought it was due to the manufacturers, who had initiated the legislation, that such a Bill should be investigated by a Select Committee as they requested, and he believed that the short delay that would thereby be caused would in no way endanger its passing. The system of inspection which had of late so much spread in this country was not only very costly but was also distasteful to our habits and customs, and could be only regarded as a violent remedy. The necessity of some such infraction of private rights could not, however, be denied, because, but for it, there would have been no Factory Act legislation. Those who at first were the strongest opponents of that system now admitted the beneficial effects of it. They had, indeed, entirely recanted the opinions which they entertained some years ago. He thought the principle of the Factory Act so successful when applied should be further applied to all trades and employments in the country, if it could be done, and as much as possible by a system of penalties on detection of offences, with as little espionage as possible. The Factory Act was, in reality, a protection of the good manufacturer against the bad, and it ought to be spread equally and impartially over every kind of employment. The difficulty, however, was, that there were some employments—chiefly agricultural—which it would be extremely difficult to place under such restrictions. The present measure extended the Factory Acts to five or six additional trades. The Bill had been drawn up in a most slovenly and objectionable manner, because it did not specifically state its provisions. It simply declared that certain six trades should be subjected to the Factory Acts, of which there were already thirteen in number. Probably no two lawyers would give the same opinion as to what those six trades would be thus subjected to. This was a slovenly and dangerous mode of framing legislation, and he therefore hoped that an early opportunity would be taken of consolidating the several acts. He gave his adherence to the principle adopted by the Bill, yielding only so far to the noble Lord that he would consent to its being referred to a Select Committee. The sole ground of opposition raised to the half-time system proposed by the Bill was a preference for the Mines Regulation Act, which permits children's full work from the age of ten. He must say, however, that he adhered to the half-time system. He did not believe that a boy could begin to work too early as long as the work given to him was suitable to his age. He could not commence too early to learn the trade by which he was to get his living in after years, as long as the boy was not subjected to too hard labour. But he did not think children were capable of full work at ten. As to the system of employing children full time and afterwards sending them to school it was a perfect farce. Mr. Bagnall, near Birmingham, a most intelligent and one of the best masters in the iron districts, had tried it, and notwithstanding that he had built schools, furnished them, and found masters, the only result was that instead of the children going home after work to bed, they were placed on benches, where they slept uncomfortably, instead of sleeping at home comfortably. It was said that the half-time system would increase the demand for children, and that the demand would thus get in excess of the supply. The same argument had been urged against the introduction of every Factory Act, and had turned out to be without the shadow of foundation.

Even if it were found difficult to supply the double requisition of children, their work was of so easy and simple a character that it would not be difficult to find a machine which would act as a substitute. Their work was in a great many cases confined to turning a wheel. If machinery for this is adopted, will parents grudge a slight loss of children's wages to economize their children's lives? It was better during the whole period of childhood to mix a child's proper work with education, than to devote him to education without work till ten, and impose full work on him after.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he wished to state his entire concurrence in the expression of gratification at the way in which the Bill had been received. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent had complained of the manner in which the manufacturers had been treated by the Commissioners in their Report, but it should be remembered that the Commissioners had given the manufacturers credit for a desire fully to concur in the objects which the Commission itself sought to promote. The Factory Acts referred to by the Bill were not thirteen, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley), but only five, and those five comprised the whole code of legislation in that direction. He would suggest that the Bill should be read a second time without opposition, and that the only point in dispute, the question as regarded the half-time, should be settled in Committee. He doubted, however, if the question would be so satisfactorily settled by a Committee upstairs as by a Committee of the whole House, while the probable effect of referring the Bill to a Special Committee would be to postpone legislation upon the subject for another year.

COLONEL EDWARDS congratulated the Vice President of the Council of Education on the production of the Bill, which would be hailed with delight by the whole manufacturing population, and at the same time he thanked his noble Friend (Lord Ingestre) for his very eloquent and able speech. Living as he did in the heart of a manufacturing district, he could bear testimony to the blessings conferred by factory legislation. He trusted he would be excused by the House in not giving a silent vote in support of the extension of the Factory Act as proposed by the Government. It might be in the recollection of the House, that sixteen years ago he had the honour of supporting the views of that true patriot and benefactor of the working classes, John Fielden, in his advocacy, when he achieved the great victory of the Ten Hours Factory Bill. At that period it met with the most determined opposition from the great body of the Liberal party, but he was now happy to find that the majority of its most strenuous opponents to their honour confessed that their views were altogether changed with regard to the measure which had proved by its working to be a complete success. Were that excellent man still living, how gratified would he be to see the introduction of this Bill for the extension of the great enactment, to which he directed his life, to all other manufactures and trades in which females and boys required protection from over-long hours of labour. He would comply with the request of the Secretary of State, and add no more to his remarks at this stage of the Bill, in order that the House might not delay its progress. He would only add that the Chambers of Commerce at Halifax and Huddersfield had petitioned in favour of this Bill; Leeds and Bradford also; and, at the latter place, at an immense public meeting this feeling was unanimous in its favour, with certain modifications in Committee.

MR. FERRAND said, he believed that the majority of the gentlemen engaged in the shipping trade of the country were in favour of the Bill, and he was therefore sorry to see the clause including shipping warehousemen in the provisions of the Bill struck out. He maintained that that course had been adopted by the Government in consequence of the pressure put upon the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department by certain Germans, inhabitants of Bradford. Might he ask the right hon. Baronet, if some pressure of a political nature had been brought to bear upon him?

SIR GEORGE GREY: I have not had any communication with a single person upon the subject.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY said, he had looked upon the first Factory Act with great fear, because he had believed that it would not answer, but he could now bear testimony to its good effects in every direction. He quite agreed in the opinion that the children worked better and learnt more under the half-time system than if all their time were devoted either to school or to labour. He thought that if they found further legislation for the protection of children successful, they might come to the House and ask them to extend the same class of legislation to agricultural labourers.

LEAD JOHN MANNERS said, he rose

to express his regret at having heard from the right hon. Gentleman that he intended to expunge from the Bill the clause relating to the hooking and lapping process, but he trusted an effort would be made in Committee to retain the clause. If the Bill should pass with that clause in it, it would entitle the right hon. Gentleman to great credit as having introduced a Reform Bill infinitely more valuable than many of those Reform Bills which had come from the Ministerial side of the House. He might add that he was quite sure that if such a measure as that which had been alluded to by the hon. Baronet the Member for Halifax were introduced, it would receive every favourable consideration from agricultural Members.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Thursday.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War to lay upon the table of the House—

“Statements of the number of Officers and Men in the Cape Coast command on the 1st day of July, 1863:

Of the number of Officers and Men landed from the Megara, at Cape Coast, in August 1863:

Return of the number of Officers and Men landed from the Tamar, at Cape Coast, on the 9th day of April, 1864:

Nominal List of the thirteen Officers who have died up to last Returns:

Nominal List of the fifteen Officers invalided up to last Returns:

Nominal List of the nine Officers remaining sick at Cape Coast:

List of the number of Men dead since the 1st day of July last:

List of the number of Men invalided since the 1st day of July last:

List of the number of Men in Hospital at last Return:

And, Statement of the remaining Effective Force at Cape Coast Castle on the 14th day of May.”

He was able to prove that these men had died from the criminal incapacity of Her Majesty's Government.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, he hoped that all the information that was in the possession of the Adjutant General on the points mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member would be laid on the table to-morrow or next day, with other papers relating to the Ashantee war. The Returns received up to the present time by the Adjutant General only reached up to the end of last April, and did not contain the names of all the Officers who were stated by the hon. and gallant Member to have died subsequently to that date. All the information that was in the possession of the Horse Guards would be laid upon the table of the House.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND). QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, When the Return relating to National Education (Ireland), which was ordered on the 19th day of February last, will be laid upon the table of the House?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he had to express his regret at the delay which had taken place in presenting the Return which was ordered in February. He understood, however, that it would be ready in two or three days, and he trusted he should be able to lay it on the table of the House in the course of the week. The delay had arisen from the pressure on the office in preparing the numerous Returns that had been ordered.

INDIA—THE INDIAN ARMY. QUESTION.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he can name a day on which he will place upon the table of the House the Warrant for the re-organization of the Indian Army in accordance with the Report of the Commission on Memorials of Indian Officers?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply, that at last he was happy to be able to give a positive answer to the hon. Baronet's Question. The Warrant had been sent by the Secretary of State for War, in whose hands it was, to the Queen, yesterday or this morning. It would be transmitted to the Council on Thursday, and he hoped it would be presented by Monday at the latest.

VICTORIA—EXPULSION OF TICKET-OF-LEAVE MEN.—QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention had been drawn to the Notice given by Mr. Kyte, M.P. for East Melbourne, of his intention to move the following Resolution in the Legislature of Victoria:—

"To move that the House will resolve itself into a Committee of the whole, to consider the propriety of presenting an Address to His Excellency the Governor, requesting that the sum of £5,000 might be placed on an additional Estimate for the purpose of defraying the expenses of exporting to Great Britain ticket-of-leave men during 1864, not exceeding 300 in number," and, in the event (as appears to be generally anticipated in the Colony) that the Resolution should pass before the despatch of the next Mail, what course the Home Government are prepared to adopt?

MR. CARDWELL replied, that he had not received any official communication from Victoria even, that the Notice of the Motion to which the hon. Gentleman referred had been given. He was sure the hon. Gentleman would not expect him to anticipate the adoption of such a Resolution by the Legislature of Victoria, and still less to state what course it might be necessary for Her Majesty's Government to take in the event of that Resolution being adopted.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Sir, as the House is not likely to receive any satisfactory answer, I give notice that I will draw the attention of the House, on the first occasion of our going into Supply, relative to the publication of the secret diplomacy in the public newspapers.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that being of a more sanguine character than the hon. Member for Liskeard, he should put the Question of which he had given notice. He wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, since secrecy is not observed by the other parties to the Conference, it would not be a mere empty form to maintain it towards the House of Commons; and whether, when the extension of the Armistice was consented to, it was understood and agreed that that extension should be final?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I will not enter into the first part of the hon. Gentleman's Question, which is only argumentative, and, I think, is hardly Parliamentary. With regard to the latter part, I have no reason—but rather the contrary—to believe that when the Armistice was prolonged there was any decision in the Conference that that prolongation should be a final one. The Question is open to the Conference, which may prolong the Armistice or not at the expiration of the present term, according to the then existing circumstances.

BRITISH TROOPS IN CANADA.

QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If the Government will fix a day for going into Committee of Supply on Colonial Estimates, on which he may bring forward that Motion of which he has given notice, on the present disposal of the British Troops in Canada?

MR. CARDWELL said, he proposed to take the Colonial Estimates on Thursday next.

INCOME TAX—RESOLUTION.

MR. HUBBARD, in rising to call attention to the operation and extent of the direct and indirect taxation as now levied, with especial reference to the Income Tax, said: Sir, What is the reason that taxes are disbursed more grudgingly than expenditure in any other form—that the tax-gatherer is universally execrated—and that taxation is a subject at once irksome and irritating? There ought, Sir, to be no ground for such a question. Taxes ought to be regarded as offerings cheerfully conceded by the various members of the community—by each according to his means—for objects essential to his welfare, and which singly he either cannot accomplish—or can accomplish only at a much greater sacrifice. In the payment of his taxes every one ought to be able to rejoice as the means by which he is best able to secure his personal safety from external foes or domestic dangers, and protection for his property and for his industry—by which, in short, he obtains the immense benefits which result from the good government, which is a main feature of advanced civilization.

But, Sir, the prevalent notion of taxation has been derived from very different considerations. With too much reason has it been complained that taxes have been levied for the gratification of the ambition and the luxury of the Sovereign; that their administration has been abused to the aggrandisement of state functionaries and their officials; and lastly, that they have been selected without wisdom and exacted without justice. In this country, Sir, whatever may have been its former condition, the two first of these complaints can be advanced no longer. We have the happiness to live under the rule of a Sovereign who, scrupulous in the exercise of her prerogative, never raises the dread banner of war, except with the concurrence of her constitutional advisers—and who, so far from exacting from the people the cost of personal indulgence, is ever ready liberally to relieve the suffering out of the fund provided for the Royal maintenance; a fund, I must remark, which, measured by the wealth of this great country, and contrasted with the expenditure of other Sovereigns, is not excessive. And again, Sir, whatever may have been the state of previous generations, we may boast, and it is a boast to which of all countries we are the best entitled, that we have a public service distinguished by the integrity of its officials. Whatever be their other faults, no man can impute in our days anything like venality or corruption to our public men. No one can impute to them malversation of the national funds, and we may safely affirm that no portion of the taxes levied upon the people is diverted from the Exchequer by official speculation. But, Sir, as to the last of these complaints, we cannot honestly deny that it applies to our fiscal system, or pretend that the odium connected with taxation in this country is a mere prejudice and not the result of a want of wisdom in the selection of taxes, and in the manner in which these taxes are levied. Our taxation, as it stands, is the result of no recognized principle—it is the growth of no settled system—it is the residuum left by separate and inharmonious acts which imposed taxes when money was wanted, and removed taxes when money could be spared, with slender regard to their bearing on the national interests or to the equity of their incidence. But, Sir, my present object is the consideration, rather of the present than the past; and we may conveniently, for our purpose, divide our taxes into direct and indirect taxes; not indeed that such a division exists in the present classification, but it may with sufficient accuracy be obtained by a careful scrutiny of the Revenue returns. Customs are of course indirect taxes; Excise are chiefly indirect; but Stamps do not of themselves indicate either direct or indirect taxation, and some of the items involve both kinds of taxation. The notice of this fact we owe to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, in the course of the present Session, pointed it out to the House. It is true, as he stated, that the tax upon Fire Insurance presses partly upon stock in trade and partly upon property. That which is levied on stock in trade is an indirect tax in so far as it operates upon the price of commodities, and is ultimately paid by the consumer; while, on the other hand, that portion which presses upon property is a direct tax, although one most unequally

Total	...	...	...	£61,200,000

I wish to say a few words in passing upon the last four items in this list, for they are neither direct nor indirect taxes. The Post Office profits are the gains upon an industrial occupation, properly undertaken by the State; but which, so far from being a tax on the community, bestows on them for each contribution that they make, a benefit far exceeding it in value. The £130,000 received from the Bank of England is a part of the larger revenue which the Crown might derive from its prerogative of coining paper into money. Fees and Crown lands require no explanation. Deducting these items we have £59,000,000, as the direct and indirect taxation of 1865-6, supposing the Income Tax of 6d. in the pound to be then still in force. But, Sir, the Income Tax expires again in April next. Can we do without it?

The list of items which I have read exhibit a total of £41,600,000 of indirect, against £10,000,000 of direct taxes, excluding the Income Tax. But what do we mean by direct and indirect taxes? I am not aware of any great authority to whom I can refer upon this subject; but I venture to suggest the definitions which these lists bring before my mind. I would say then, that indirect taxes are such as are levied upon commodities either at their importation or production, or upon their transfer, and which being so levied merge into the constituents of price, and are ultimately paid by the consumer; and that direct taxes are, as such, levied either upon property in its corpus, or on the products of property and industry as they accrue or are created. If we come to examine still further what are the peculiar advantages of each, we must necessarily take a retrospective view. The House is of course aware that, up to 1842, indirect taxation was the means of raising by far the largest portion of our revenue. Indirect taxation has considerable advantages. Indirect taxation being comprised in the price of commodities, is paid almost unconsciously, and therefore paid not unwillingly. It falls in a great measure upon luxuries, and is levied upon people according to their income, as expressed in their expenditure. It raises no difficulty as between the State and the tax-payer, and it creates no jealousies between different classes of the community. There are, therefore, many very evident advantages connected with indirect taxation. But, on the other hand, we cannot refrain from seeing that there are some imperfections in indirect taxation standing by itself. Through indirect taxation you can tax people according to their means as exhibited in their expenditure. But we know that expenditure is not always an exact test of means. It is so if you take the whole community at large; but it is not so with regard to individuals. Persons who are in a position that obliges them to press closely upon their income are, by indirect taxation, exposed to an aggravation of that pressure; while those who may be called economical, and who lay up a very large portion of their income, escape with a comparatively small pressure upon their means. But there is another and wider disadvantage in indirect taxation. Indirect taxation, as it presses upon the price of articles of general consumption, has the effect of elevating the prices of labour by elevating the cost of sustaining labour. And when we consider the immense foreign commerce of this country, when we consider how dependent this country is upon foreign trade, upon the export of its manufactures, for the maintenance of its commercial supremacy, we must also see that nothing could be more opposed to the progress of its commercial prosperity than the exclusive adoption of indirect taxation. It is, no doubt, true that the great measure of Sir Robert Peel for the removal of the tax upon corn and other articles of food was a first and most important step towards the liberation of our foreign trade from the prejudicial effects of indirect taxation. His eminent successor, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, has gone a great length in the path of commercial reform upon which Sir Robert Peel entered. But there are still unrepealed a large number of indirect taxes which might be advantageously removed. Let us pass in review our present indirect taxes. With regard to the taxes on spirits, tobacco, and wine, which will produce £19,000,000, I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer is quite satisfied to leave their efficiency unimpaired. But next we have the Malt duty. Malt is an article which is highly interesting to Gentlemen on both sides of the House, and only recently we have had a discussion upon the propriety of reducing or abolishing the duty upon malt. Amongst the agricultural classes also, from one end of the country to the other, a most active agitation has been initiated for the abolition of the malt duty. I now come to the duty on Tea. I cannot think that a duty of 100 per cent is a satisfactory duty upon an article which enters so largely into the comforts, not only of men, but of all the women and children throughout the country. Again, the duty of 40 per cent on Coffee considerably restricts the consumption of that wholesome beverage. Sugar, also, is an article which, although it is now subject to a duty of only 33 per cent, is more heavily taxed than any article should be which constitutes so important a feature in the sustenance of the people. Then, coming to Currants and Raisins, we all know that English plum pudding is a standing dish for many families on Sunday, and for every family on Christmas day, and that our plum pudding is made of currants and raisins [a laugh], and they pay a 30 per cent duty. I now come to an article which I am quite sure nobody is so anxious to liberate from taxation as my right hon. Friend. In the course of one of those eloquent and jubilant orations in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer imparted to the discussion of a financial measure the interest of a romance, he took occasion to refer to the state of taxation some forty years ago, and quoted expressions of Sidney Smith, the witty canon of St. Paul's, who, in his peculiar style, described everything in the earth and under the earth as taxed in this country; and amongst the things he mentioned Spices. My right hon. Friend said, "the poor man's salt had been taxed, that salt was now free; the rich man's spice had been taxed, the rich man's spice was free." Well, but did my right hon. Friend forget that pepper is the poor man's spice, and that pepper pays a duty of 133 per cent? Then we come to Corn. Corn is now taxed at an amount which some persons may regard as a mere registration tax. Very rigid votaries of free trade look upon it as a tax equal to  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and therefore as one which is not compatible with the carrying out to their full extent the principles of free trade and the abolition of protection. ["Hear!"] I will not go so far as that, but I must say that I should gladly concur in the reduction to 1d. per cwt. of the present duty of 3d. a cwt. on corn. I now turn to the questionable items of direct taxation; and there I find the duty upon Fire Insurance on property. The ingenuity of my right hon. Friend was never exercised so perversely as when he diminished the duty paid upon the insurance of stock-in-trade, and left undiminished the duty upon the insurance of house property: that very property which is insured when it belongs not to the rich but to the poor, and is therefore peculiarly ill-suited to bear the burden of this arbitrary impost. The utter failure of the professional advocate enlisted by the Government to justify this tax and the unequivocal decision of the House will, I cannot doubt, ensure its diminution in future Budgets.

We have now before us a direct tax of £1,050,000, and indirect taxes amounting to £17,400,000, of which the abolition or mitigation is urgently demanded by sound policy, or advocated by important sections of the community ably represented in this House. And it is obvious that if any of those permanent taxes are to be abolished or sensibly diminished, while the public expenditure remains unchanged, you must provide a permanent substitute. You cannot increase the taxation of luxuries. Spirits and tobacco are taxed as highly as they can be without provoking smuggling and illicit distillation, and wine we could not charge with heavier duties consistently with our engagements by treaty. Can we increase direct taxation through any of the existing channels? Probates and letters of administration, legacy and succession duties are very proper methods of taxation, but it is perfectly obvious that you cannot carry either of those taxes to a much greater length without danger of evasion. I heard of a gentleman the other day who distributed half a million sterling before his death among his children, and by doing so he saved £5,000. If you were to increase this tax largely, a much greater tendency to personal disposition would be provoked, and you would take from the tax a portion of its productiveness. Deeds, stamps, and other charges of that kind, are already high enough; they press very sensibly upon the transfer and leasing of real property. The land tax you cannot touch, for from the peculiar position in which it stands, having been partially redeemed, you can neither add to it nor diminish it; all that can be done is, at a favourable moment, to give an opportunity for its entire redemption. The house tax is, I think, one of the least objectionable in principle, because the expenditure in house rent, taking the community from end to end, represents the same proportion of every man's means. Whether we look to the labourer with 15s. a week, or to the man of £15,000 a year, we may roughly estimate at one-tenth of his expenditure the sum spent in rent. Houses then are a very fair test of means, and therefore a fair medium of taxation, but even with houses you soon reach the ultimate point. The tax is now 9d. in the pound; but if you exceed 2s. or 10 per cent, the tax becomes oppressive, and men will try to escape its pressure. To my view, therefore, we are in this position, we have a number of taxes which more or less demand remission, but we have no taxes either direct or indirect which we can venture sensibly to increase. How then are we to dispense with the tax which last year produced £10,000,000 sterling, and which at 6d. in the pound is calculated in 1865 to produce £7,400,000. It appears to me that the Income Tax stands in a position from which you are utterly unable to dislodge it. You cannot do without it, because no one will sacrifice in that tax his hope of the possible remission of other taxes to which he is personally opposed. In taking into view the pressure of direct and indirect taxation we must recollect that there are some persons who can be reached only by direct taxation. There are many persons who from their penurious habits, or the magnitude of their wealth, go on accumulating, but pay comparatively little to the State. I believe a miser to be a more useful citizen than a spendthrift, but the miser ought not to escape his fair share of the national burdens. There are, however, others who also escape. There are a large number of our fellow countrymen who live beyond these shores who possess incomes to the amount of £5,000, £10,000 and £15,000 a year, and who spend them in foreign parts. In the absence of direct taxation these persons escape altogether, and the only way you can reach them is by taking a portion of their revenue in the country in which it has accrued. The conclusion, therefore, to which I come is, that it is our duty to maintain in due proportions both direct and indirect taxation. It appears to me that our direct taxation cannot be diminished if you intend to maintain a proper equilibrium, or if you desire to introduce those reductions in our fiscal tariff which so many hon. Members are anxious to effect. For those reductions would leave a vacuum. By what tax are we to fill it? The tax which now supplies all deficiencies is the Property and Income Tax; and in some shape or other an Income Tax you must pay. Upon what principles must it be levied? I believe that no serious difficulty would arise if you only deal with the subject truthfully. What you want is to provide for the annual expenditure of the country, and that expenditure can only be defrayed from subsidies raised from the community at large. If you take it from annual income you take it at once from the appropriate source; and, if you act upon the principle of levying the tax on the net products of property, you leave, so far as they are concerned, no room whatever for dissatisfaction. We have to look, however, not only to realized property, but to the earnings of industry and skill, and here we arrive at another and more complicated portion of the subject. It is a theory of many who have studied the science of taxation closely, that taxation ought never to infringe on the earnings of skill and industry, but should await the result of those earnings in their future investment. But that is a theory which can hardly be maintained. Take the case of a person engaged in law or medicine, who, by his great skill, makes his £15,000 or £20,000 a year, but being of rather Epicurean habits saves nothing. Supposing you were to rely upon the direct taxation of the products of property, the earnings of his skill and industry would escape altogether. And yet that man is protected by the State in his person, and in the enjoyment of everything that constitutes his happiness. I do maintain that he is bound to make some contribution towards the general fund out of his industrial gains. Critically speaking, industrial incomes of the higher classes are not derived from labour alone. The learning of the barrister and the science of the physician are acquirements resulting from a large previous expenditure, and constitute their capital; and the more we press this subject to a precise conclusion, the more, as it appears to me, we shall be brought to confess, that there is required in the production of industrial incomes a concurrence of capital with industry. The question then arises, in what proportion is capital combined with industry to be taxed? We cannot here, as in the United States, call for a return of the capital invested; but we can take the combined results and tax them in an estimated average proportion. It has been suggested that a tax of two-thirds upon those combined earnings of industry and capital would meet the requirements of the case, and I will show how closely the present law has sanctioned that proportion. In dealing with this question I am most reluctant to introduce any reference to what may concern me personally. I say this with perfect frankness, because in this matter I have no vanity to gratify and no ambition to promote. I shall probably be told that my plan has been tried and condemned, but I venture to say that any condemnation which has been passed upon it has been pronounced by those who have not made themselves thoroughly masters of the subject, and now I will prove it. I am sure my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer must be considered not inferior in ability or power to any of my opponents. In what light does my right hon. Friend look upon that plan? Really if I did not feel that it was necessary for the elucidation of the question, I would not care to reproduce a series of unfounded censures; but I think it essential to investigate the principles which underlie the taxation of this country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer designated my plan as

"One which would favour those who were wealthiest, and whose wealth increased most rapidly, and which would lay heavier burdens upon property;" as a plan "which would introduce principles arbitrary and capricious, and which, so far from diminishing existing evils, would only increase them; which would introduce discord between class and class; a plan more dangerous and less plausible than the principle of graduated taxation."—[See 3 Hansard, clxix. p. 1845-46.] And the Chancellor of the Exchequer has himself introduced the principle of graduated taxation, because he thinks that with all its vices it is better than the plan which I placed before him. But what I have to observe is this, that not one of those allegations has been brought to a definite trial. There was strong language and strong condemnation, but there was no evidence. In one instance only has the right hon. Gentleman given me the opportunity of testing the force of his objections, and in that instance he signally failed to prove his charge. The substance of it was this, that by the process which I proposed the assessment upon real property would be raised to  $1s. 1\frac{1}{2}d.$ , while the payment of the great merchants would be reduced to  $8d.$ —a difference of something like 70 per cent in favour of the latter. It is only by means of a Parliamentary paper (No. 248), which came out last summer, that I have had an opportunity of bringing to a definite conclusion the substance of that charge; and the result is this, that if you take the sums which were levied on lands and houses, fines, and farms—the four items which constitute real property—in 1862 at  $9d.$  in the pound, and compare them with the sums which those items would have contributed under my plan, the result would be, that whereas in the first instance they were taxed to the amount of £4,830,000, in the second they would appear to be taxed at £5,023,000, a difference of £193,000, resolving in a rate of  $9d. 36-100$  per cent. The percentage of difference between the merchant and the landed proprietor is something under 32 per cent instead of 70, and the rate which lands and houses would be subject to, according to my right hon. Friend's own calculation of  $11\frac{1}{2}d.$  in the pound, would be brought down to  $10d.$  I am sure my right hon. Friend would never have made a charge without supposing it to be accurate; but if in the only instance in which he has given a definite expression to his charge he is not justified, I ask the House to suspend its judgment as to my right hon. Friend's remarks upon other more important matters which I have submitted for consideration. There is only one other instance upon which I shall comment, and that is a very important one, because it raises the question of graduated taxation. My right hon. Friend said in March, 1863,

"In my opinion more is to be said in favour of graduated taxation than for his (Mr. Hubbard's) plan. A graduated taxation recognizes poverty in one class and overgrown wealth in another, and justice demands that one should pay less and the other more. There is something rather plausible in that principle, more so than in my hon. Friend's plan. . . . He takes a widow, with £200 a year from the Funds, with six children to educate, to train, and to start in the world, and he takes the case of a great merchant—I will not say brewer or banker, as there seems to be some objection to specifying those flourishing classes—but to a great merchant, with £20,000 a year, he grants a relief to the extent of one-third, and in order to do that he adds 25 per cent to the burden of the poor widow."—[3 Hansard, clxix. 1846.]

If I were disposed to create a momentary impression in my favour, and to gain a vote, I could cite extreme cases and deceptive illustrations which would tend the other way. I could have said the subject at issue is this—"Will you tax an industrious hard-working clerk who has his 200 guineas a year, a wife and six children to maintain, who is obliged to lay by one-third of his income (which will procure a certainty of only £100 a year for his surviving family instead of the 200 guineas which he gets now), will you tax him at the rate of  $9d.$  in the pound, while you put the same tax upon the capitalist whose money brings him in an income of £20,000 per annum?" The Chancellor of the Exchequer put extreme cases, but I did not. I thought it better to rest the discussion upon principles which would bear examination, and not to appeal to a morbid and spurious sympathy. But as for "the poor widow" with her £200 a year, is she the widow of a Cabinet Minister, or of a poor clerk? If the former, she is poor indeed; if the latter she is passing rich; and I must say that this illustration of my right hon. Friend brought vividly to my mind an exhibition which I saw some years ago in the suburbs of London. A parochial election was going on. A great parish office was vacant, that of sexton, and there were two candidates, the one the assistant of the late sexton, and the other the late sexton's widow. The assistant was satisfied to base his claim upon his reputation in the parish, and his placard bore simply

"Dunkley for Sexton." But the widow, more wise, had a placard which ran thus—"Vote for the widow Scroggins, and the five fatherless children," and, no doubt, that appeal found an echo in the breasts of many. And so it is that my right hon. Friend brings forward illustrations which have no proper bearing on the argument, but serve the purpose of raising a prejudice. If you do make comparisons, compare poverty with poverty, and riches with riches, but not poverty with riches, and then how does it turn out? I will take the widow Scroggins with her five fatherless children, and if she has 200 guineas a year in the funds, I say she is much better off than the poor clerk with his salary of 200 guineas, his wife and six children.

But let us pass from the poor widow, the one extreme selected by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to his other extreme, the rich merchant who makes his £20,000 a year. The present law says to him, "You shall never pay in any one year on more than you make in that year. You make a return upon an average of three years, but you need never pay on more than you make in any particular year." And what is the consequence of that 133rd clause? Why, we had Mr. Plessy before us in the inquiry of 1861, and he gave us a probable scale under which a trader making fluctuating profits would pay three-eighths less than the sum in which he would be otherwise charged. In the ordinary course of trade, a merchant, brewer, or manufacturer might, upon the principle of the fluctuating scale of profits, easily escape by paying half the tax which other persons making equal profits pay into the Exchequer. Therefore, when my right hon. Friend attacks me for taking the part of the rich merchant, I, on the contrary, say, that it is the privilege of the rich merchant which I am anxious to relinquish. And now, Sir, let us consider what is the principle upon which an equitable Income Tax must be constructed. Beginning with the products of real property, are we to tax alike the rack rent of £1,200 a year from lands and of £1,200 from houses. If we are, we are adopting a principle wholly contradictory to the principle laid down by this House, acted upon in several instances, and now being carried out throughout the country in the parochial assessment. The principle of the parochial assessment is to tax the net produce of real property, and you are doing a grievous injustice to real property if you attempt to proceed upon any other principle than that which the parochial assessment system involves. But the measure of injustice with regard both to houses and lands is not limited by the mere taxation upon the outgoings. We are indebted to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for having brought clearly into view the injustice done to the owners of encumbered property, for they have alone to pay the tax upon the outgoings of the property. I mentioned last year the case of a man with an estate of £2,000 a year, but burdened to the extent of £1,600, who had to pay the tax upon £400, although the outgoings of £200 left him a net residue of only £200. The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought that case impossible, but so far was it from being impossible that I myself am trustee to a property in a position precisely similar, and the unhappy landowner does pay 18d. in the pound when the capitalist mortgagee pays but 9d. on his interest. Can that be satisfactory in a tax which is, perhaps, to take a permanent place in our fiscal system? Now, with regard to the other question, namely, the allowance upon the taxation of industrial earnings. In the year 1853 the Chancellor of the Exchequer frankly admitted the grievance imposed upon industrial earnings, he repeated it in his Budget speech of that year several times, and everybody expected that he was prepared, not only to acknowledge the grievance, but also to apply a remedy. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the land was already overcharged to the extent of 16 per cent, or one-sixth, which so far balanced the overcharge on trade; but he would give a still further remission. Savings are generally considered a fair subject for remission, and accordingly the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "We will give a further remission of taxation upon all savings to the extent of one-sixth, provided that those savings be invested in a life policy." There was a boon, but it was destroyed by the condition attached to it. But the one-sixth overcharged on land and the one-sixth upon savings make exactly the one-third which I have asked as an abatement upon industrial incomes, concurrently with an allowance for out-goings on land and houses. And now a word as to the way in which the tax acts upon the morals, not only of those who have to pay it, but of those who have to administer it. We have had over and over again instances of the most grievous fraud; instances in which the fraud was so gross that the authorities did not dare to expose or punish it. The fact is, the law is so unjust that you dare not enforce it and punish those who are guilty of its violation. It is a law which demoralizes not only its victims but its administrators. I will communicate to the House a most remarkable paper which lately came into my possession. In the year 1846 the Government made a loan to the landed gentry of the country, and it was principally taken up by the Scotch proprietors. It was made repayable in the shape of a twenty-two years' annuity; and the document which I hold in my hand is a circular issued by the Stamps and Taxes Office in Edinburgh to the assessors and collectors throughout the country. It is as follows:

"DRAINAGE ACT—CIRCULAR TO COLLECTORS.

"Stamps and Taxes, Edinburgh, 1st March, 1849.

"SIR,—It is proper that I apprise you, for your information and guidance, that the Board are of opinion that parties to whom advances have been made under the Drainage Act, 9 and 10 Vict. cap. 101, are entitled to claim deduction of the property tax on the rent charges payable by them. The Board, however, do not consider it necessary to offer such deduction to parties paying those rent charges, but that it will be sufficient to allow it when claimed. I have also to inform you that such parties as claim the deduction due at 10th of October last, but which they omitted to do at that time, may be allowed to claim it at the 5th April next, along with the deduction due at the latter date, but always in the event only of the parties making the claim.

"When you transmit to me the half-yearly return of the drainage rent charges, you will accompany it with a list of the names of the parties who claimed and received deduction of the property tax, stating the amount of deduction claimed and allowed to each for said half-year, and you will be allowed credit for the amount at this office.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
(Signed) "ANGUS FLETCHER."

Well, Sir, this circular may have been issued by the Edinburgh Comptroller only in obedience to instructions from his superiors in office; but I must say that it is a document which I blush to read, because it is nothing more nor less than an instruction to collectors that, whereas certain persons indebted to the State have a right to deduct from their payments the amount of their Income Tax, yet if these persons, in their unsuspecting ignorance, failed to demand that concession, it was not to be offered or to be hinted at. The money is to be taken and no questions asked, unless a specific demand is made for a deduction.

This is equivalent to what other Governments have done when they have received their dues in sterling coin and have paid their debts in a base currency. They have received on the one hand that which was their due, and have given on the other something of less value. The transactions to which this document referred were the occasion of a special enactment in 1853, under circumstances to which I must also allude. In the Income Tax Act of 1853, the Government introduced a clause providing with especial reference to the Drainage Annuities of 1846, that those who paid them should be allowed Income Tax only on the interest and not on the principal repaid. This clause was in the words of the enactment a "just provision," and yet at the same time the Government refused the same justice to their own creditors, under precisely analogous circumstances. Before I leave the question of trade incomes, I wish to direct the attention of the House to the 133rd clause of the Act of 5 & 6 Vict. I do not believe that the House is aware of the extent to which the existing law favours those who make large but fluctuating profits. We have heard that in the course of the great speculation in cotton, which has taken place of late years, enormous sums—such as £200,000 and £300,000—have been made by individuals in the course of a year. Would the House imagine that it is perfectly possible for persons making £300,000 in one year as traders, to escape the taxation of that sum altogether under the operation of the 133rd section. The process is this: A man making £3,000 a year in ordinary trade, returns £3,000 as the average of 1861, 1862, and 1863, for assessment in 1864; but in 1864 he realizes £300,000 by his speculations. What happens then? Although he realizes that sum of £300,000, making altogether £303,000, he only pays on the previous returns of £3,000. The next year that large sum comes into his average, and he returns for assessment £103,000, but if in 1865 he makes only £3,000 he only pays on £3,000. In 1866, he would also return £103,000 as the average, but if again he made only £3,000 in that year he would pay upon that amount only. Again, in 1867, he would return £103,000 for assessment, but would pay on £3,000. The next year the £300,000 will pass altogether out of his calculations, and upon that enormous sum he will not have paid one farthing. That is a remarkable but true illustration of the way in which this 133rd section operates in favouring persons making large profits by speculation. Then again if a man takes stock every year, and values his profits every year, he would pay on all he makes, but if he takes stock every other year he would only pay half the tax. If he took stock every third year then he would only pay one-third of the tax. If he only took stock every fourth year, by this clause he would escape the tax altogether. I think my right hon. Friend could not have been aware of the way in which this clause operates when he ventured to stand up for the integrity of the present Income Tax. I should have felt that it was somewhat presumptuous to bring the question of taxation again before the House this year, had it not been for what has happened in the course of the present Session. In his Budget speech, the right hon. Gentleman said

"There is another question that it is my duty to bring under the view of the House; it is the question of the Income Tax."—[3 Hansard, clxxiv. 583.]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is out of order in making any reference to a speech delivered in this House in the course of the present Session.

MR. HUBBARD: All I will say is that the House has gathered from what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman on other occasions that the Income Tax was a subject upon the future of which the Parliament had yet to decide, and I therefore imagined that I was really assisting the object which the right hon. Gentleman has in view in bringing before the House some of the features connected with the tax as it now stands. It is quite true that in previous Sessions the right hon. Gentleman has remarked that with the peculiar views which I entertain with regard to the oppressive and unjust character of the tax he does not agree. I am sorry for that, because, if he himself were sensible of these defects and inequalities, he would not only acknowledge them, but would probably attempt to find a remedy. And now, Sir, I would notice one further argument which may be urged to arrest the disposition of the House to reform this tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has brought this question before the House: Is public economy compatible with the maintenance of the Income Tax? He has stated that his great experience in the office he holds has raised in himself serious doubts whether it is possible to retain the Income Tax as an habitual means of raising our national revenue compatibly with the exercise—he does not say of a rigid economy—but of reasonable thrift. Well, Sir, I think that not only is an Income Tax compatible with due economy, but that it is highly eligible upon the very premises suggested by the argument of my right hon. Friend; for let me observe this, that to arrive at any other conclusion would be to admit that a tax may be devised, the most just and the most equitable, and one to which the whole country will cheerfully contribute; but if the tax is supposed to provide the Government of the country with a revenue more easily than would a less popular tax, it should be rejected. That appears to me to be an extraordinary doctrine, for it rests upon the assumption that the Finance Minister himself is either weak or incapable, or that he has to deal with a profligate House of Commons, ready to back him in any unwarrantable expenditure of the public funds. Now, I cannot admit that the right hon. Gentleman is weak or incapable; nor can I venture to believe that any of his successors, whoever they may be, are likely to be either weak or incapable. Neither can I apprehend that the present, or any succeeding, House of Commons will be so profligate as to connive with the Government of the day in wasting the public resources. The House, I feel sure, will join me in altogether disregarding that argument. I have little more to say upon the subject. I conceive that as taxation in itself is a proof of civilization, so I am satisfied that an Income Tax equitably devised, and, therefore, readily accepted by the country, would be a mark not only of high civilization but of high morality; and I do believe that this country does possess that amount of high morality which can enable it more than any country to support an Income Tax. I will here advert to one incident which falls under the eye of every Gentleman in this House—I mean the constant recurrence in the public prints of notices from the Chancellor of the Exchequer in acknowledgment of the receipt of such and such sums from A., B., C., or D., as Income Tax due to the State. These remittances vary from large sums to very small ones, and they amount to as much as from £5,000 to £10,000 a year. I was touched by observing a notice not long since of the receipt of 20s. from a curate. Incidents such as these prove how scrupulous many of our countrymen are to give to the State everything which they believe to be its due ; and I say that while that high tone of feeling does survive, we ought to be aware of discouraging it by either careless or wilful disregard of justice in our legislation. But I do believe that so long as the present tax lasts you will diverge further and further from that state of public mind and feeling which alone can make an Income Tax tolerable. My right hon. Friend in some of his speeches illustrated the difficulty of fiscal legislation as a " dealing with flesh and blood." No doubt there is a natural aversion on the part of any man to pay that which is extracted from him at the cost of personal sacrifices. But, in looking at this question, I think there is more than flesh and blood concerned in our legislation—these taxpayers have souls and intellects, and they ought to have consciences ; but their souls have been degraded and their consciences dulled, while their intellects have been striving to baffle injustice and oppression by fraud and evasion.

An hon. MEMBER moved that the House be counted, but the Speaker having counted and found that a House was present—

MR. HUBBARD resumed : The Chancellor of the Exchequer has spoken of this tax as one of which the defects were known, so that the back had adapted itself to the burden ; but I believe that his proverb should be read the other way, and that the back on which the burden rested becoming impatient had thrown off just as much of it as seemed convenient. The evil is, that in that process there is an essential and inevitable degradation of the whole man, and that is a far more important consideration ["Hear, hear!"] than the mere money grievance. I make this Motion at a period when the Budget has been disposed of, and in such a way that its affirmation can cause no inconvenience to the Government. I have stated that the change I desire is one to be adopted not now but hereafter. I therefore do appeal to the House and to those who are connected with the Government, to put away from them the idea that in voting for my Motion they will cause any embarrassment to the Government. And I venture to entreat the House, with all the earnestness I possess, to join me in deprecating the re-imposition in its present form of a tax inevitable, but which as now administered is rife with pecuniary wrong and moral deterioration to our fellow countrymen. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution :—

SIR JOHN HAY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the inequalities and injustice attending the operation of the existing Property and Income Tax, disqualify it for being continuously re-imposed in its present form, as one of the means of levying the National Revenue."

MR. WHALLEY said, it was unnecessary to follow the subject further than the hon. Gentleman had done in order to show the inequality and injustice of the tax, and he hoped the enlightened pertinacity of the hon. Member would induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider the effect of the tax on those who had to pay it. He would, however, venture to remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer that when some years ago he (Mr. Whalley) ventured to call attention to the injustice and immorality of the tax, the answer of the right hon. Gentleman was, not to deny the statements put forward, but to ask how they were to find a substitute. The Income Tax was, to all intents and purposes, not a direct tax, but an indirect tax, the most injurious and oppressive that could possibly be devised, so far as it was levied upon persons in respect of trade or occupation. A grocer or a draper regarded it as a necessary outgoing, and one which he must recompense himself by charging more for his goods. It was against the science of political economy to tax trade in that manner. Under the statute of Elizabeth for raising rates for the relief of the poor, vestries might levy the rate not on lands and houses merely, but on stock in trade and other personal property, but they knew that to do so would be unwise, as the result would be that the tradesman would have to charge more for his goods, and in that way the public would suffer. And he did not know what distinction there was between the imperial tax and the local tax. But the great question was, did the income tax tend to demoralize the traders of this country—and in his opinion it did. He did not agree with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckingham that the tax should be continued, and be modified. He thought the Property Tax should be separated entirely from the Income Tax, that the Income Tax should be done away with and the Property Tax maintained.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I freely admit that it would be most unfair to charge my hon. Friend who brought forward this Motion either with seeking to embarrass the Government, or with a desire to place the prosecution of his own purposes in the way of the necessary financial legislation which devolves upon this House from year to year. On the contrary, I thank my hon. Friend for having upon all occasions been ready and desirous to distinguish between this annual Motion, as I think I may call it—for, though the form has changed, the substance remains the same—and the prosecution of these financial measures. But I still think that my hon. Friend, having watched the course of affairs in this House during the last two hours, must be of opinion with me that it is not the desire or the sentiment of the House that this Motion should be adopted, or even that it should be discussed in that infinite variety of detail which is necessary for its adequate discussion. My hon. Friend, having explained his views with his usual ability, has been supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough, and by no one else, although the last moment was given for any one else to interpose, and I only rose to speak as the question was about to be put from the Chair. But the champions of the Motion, who are only two, are themselves wide as the poles asunder. My hon. Friend opposite recommends a modification of the schedules, adhering to the principle of the taxation of income, but giving, as he thinks, to that principle a more just and accurate application. But his only supporter in this House entirely repudiates the taxation of income—proposes to abolish and erase it altogether from the statute-book, and to substitute simply the taxation of property. The hon. Member for Peterborough has stated the principle of his proposal, but he has refrained from drawing aside the veil of general declaration, so as to enable the House to comprehend what was really meant. Let me attempt to fill the void which he has left, and state what I understand to be the practical effect of his proposal. The Income Tax is at present levied upon an annual income which may be stated roughly at £300,000,000. It is something more than that amount, but that sum will do for the purposes of argument. Of that amount £100,000,000 consists of income derived from visible property, or that which is popularly known by the name of "Schedule A." This may be taken as about one-third of the income which bears the tax, and the proposal of my hon. Friend (Mr. Whalley)

is to abolish the tax upon income so far as regards Schedules B, C, D and E, leaving Schedule A the undivided honour and responsibility of furnishing whatever proceeds we may require from the tax. In other words, at the comparatively moderate figure at which the tax now stands he would propose to relieve all other classes of income except those in Schedule A, to reduce the tax from 6d. to zero upon these classes of income, and in order to fill up the gap he would raise the tax in Schedule A from 6d. to 1s. 6d. in the pound; or if we are to suppose the return of periods of crisis and of exigency, such as the nation has seen—the occurrence of a great war threatening our national existence—the farmers in Schedule B, the fundholders in Schedule C, the traders in Schedule D, and the salaried officials in Schedule E—who, under the old method of imposing the tax, might pay 2s. in the pound—would pay nothing, while those assessed in Schedule A would pay at the moderate rate of only 6s. in the pound. That is the proposal of the only supporter of my hon. Friend, and, considering that the supporters of the Motion are but two, and that their views are so widely apart, I recommend a serious and prolonged conference between them respecting the principles upon which they are to prosecute this great cause in the House of Commons, so that when next it is brought forward we may somewhat narrow the field of discussion. My hon. Friend opposite has replied to speeches made by me on former occasions in this House; but, considering what has since taken place in respect to this tax, I am sure he will not require from me that I should follow him through these details. If it were the will of the House that we should seriously address ourselves to this question with a view to a present and a regular issue, I should be at once prepared to obey and take point by point the topics urged by my hon. Friend. But, reading the intentions of the House in a different sense from my hon. Friend, I mean to deal very briefly with the subject. I shall, therefore, only refer to one or two points casually mentioned by my hon. Friend, and then state what I propose with regard to his Motion. He complains that I have illustrated his scheme unfairly by selecting extreme cases, and he says it would be easy to take extreme cases in illustrating the working of the present law. But I do not think my hon. Friend gives due weight to the enormous difference in our respective positions as regards the argument upon this subject. My hon. Friend proposes a plan which he has matured in his ingenious mind, but which has never yet obtained the acceptance either of Parliament or even of a Minister responsible for the conduct of the finances of the country. For more than forty years an Income Tax has been in operation in this country, but the plan of my hon. Friend has never been in operation, and consequently remains a matter of rhetoric or of speculation. The anomalies and inequalities, the existence of which in the Income Tax I do not deny, do not stand upon the same footing with the anomalies and the inequalities which he would seek to introduce. My hon. Friend does not propose to get rid of anomalies; he merely proposes to displace a system to which the nation is habituated in order to substitute a scheme full of anomalies not less gross than those of the present tax, with the additional disadvantage that they are perfectly novel. Why are we to undertake the labour and undergo the risks and the responsibilities attending the replacing of a scheme that is imperfect and full of solecisms by another scheme which is also imperfect and also full of solecisms? Passing from this point, let me say that I only heard with regret one portion of my hon. Friend's speech—in which he impeached the morality of the officers of the revenue department, and, quoting a circular issued in 1849 from this department in Scotland, said that the consciences of the officers there, if not of the officers in the three kingdoms, were tainted and rendered impure, and their integrity deteriorated by being called upon to administer the Income Tax. If my hon. Friend takes so extreme a view of the operation of the tax I think he ought to have given us the opportunity of consulting some of those gentlemen, and of knowing what was to be said in their defence against so grievous and, as I think, so needless and gratuitous an imputation. My hon. Friend says I have dealt in general imputations against his scheme and have produced no evidence. In answer to this I request the House to reflect what has taken place in regard to the Income Tax since my hon. Friend took the championship of this particular view of the subject into his hands. When my hon. Friend began in 1860 the crusade, he did not find the House at all indisposed to go with him. My hon. Friend invited inquiry by a Committee. The Government, disbelieving in any useful result in the sense described by the hon. Gentleman, did their best to oppose it, but they were overruled by a majority of the House. I mention that to show that my hon. Friend addressed an audience favourably predisposed to his view. The Committee sat, and if it took no evidence, I know that some of the ablest men acquainted with this subject were examined, and if their testimony is not to be called evidence, I do not know what deserves that name. Those gentlemen, the ablest that could be found to support my hon. Friend's views, were examined and cross-examined by a Committee composed of some of the best men in this House, and so most competent to deal with this subject. [MR. HUBBARD: That evidence was all in favour of the plan.] Was it? I do not think my hon. Friend gained much advantage by it. What was the effect of all the evidence which we are told was entirely in favour of his plan? It was this—that not only those who had been previously opposed to his plan remained unconverted, but that divers gentlemen, who when they entered that Committee had been more or less favourably disposed towards the views of my hon. Friend, ultimately concurred in a Report which repudiated and rejected his proposal. My hon. Friend made his own Motion, found the House willing to adopt it against the view of the Government, obtained his own tribunal, produced the best witnesses he could find, before the best men the House could select, and the result was a decision adverse to his views. What degree of respect has he shown for the conclusion of his own Committee? Did he allow even a decent interval to elapse? Did he allow this question to lie fallow for even one year? Having failed in that Committee, he came down to the House with unabated breath and with unalterable resolution to protest against the decision of his own Committee, and with determined purpose, and what my hon. Friend behind me calls "enlightened pertinacity," he has made up his mind that the House shall accede to his plan, whether it will or not. He has, indeed, this year varied the terms of his Motion. He has not called upon the House directly to adopt his plan, although a great portion of his argument was addressed in support of that plan. He has now called upon the House to adopt a Resolution which recites "that the inequalities and injustice attending the operation of the existing Property and Income Tax disqualify it for being continually reimposed in its present form as one of the means of levying the national revenue." I do not think the House of Commons will be disposed to adopt a Resolution of an abstract nature, especially upon such a subject. The experience we have had of abstract Resolutions upon questions of revenue has not been so inviting as to induce us to repeat the experiment now. Unsound in principle, they have been found inconvenient in practice. They are objectionable, because they involve the proceedings of this House in ambiguity, because they raise expectations which are afterwards disappointed, because they multiply and even embitter the causes of divided opinion and party conflict, always of necessity sufficiently numerous in a popular assembly. In my opinion, the arguments against these Resolutions were quite strong enough before the Resolution upon the Paper Duty, and the experiences which followed the adoption of that Resolution has afforded an additional lesson of warning against the repetition of the practice. Let the House deal as it can with taxes which affect the country, but let it promise nothing with respect to a tax except that which it is able and willing to perform. But my hon. Friend in proposing this abstract Resolution at the same time condemned it. The first half hour of his speech my hon. Friend employed in analyzing the present state of our taxation, and in showing that at least twenty millions in value of our indirect taxation ought to be greatly reduced or entirely abolished; that the tea duty should be largely reduced; that the sugar duties should be considerably reduced; that the coffee duty should be got rid of; that the pepper duty should be got rid of; and that the malt duty should be altogether abolished. Having had a ground for sweeping away a great portion of twenty millions of taxation we had a right to expect that the man who wrought such a work of ruin and desolation among the resources of the Exchequer would have devoted the rest of his speech to an endeavour to rebuild the edifice which he had cast down. It was with astonishment that I heard my hon. Friend not recommending any reduction of expenditure—and I never see my hon. Friend taking any part in a vote for reducing expenditure—but, not recommending any reduction of expenditure, he devoted the last moiety of his speech to urging upon the House to adopt a Resolution that eight millions more should be cut off from the Exchequer. I do not think that is a proper way of dealing with a matter of taxation. No doubt there are inequalities and evils attaching to the existing system of Income Tax, but let us not part with that tax until we know how to supply its place. Do not let us adopt a Resolution which holds out an expectation of parting with that tax until we have something in the nature of a practical scheme laid down and matured, by which we may be able to attain that much-desired consummation. I promised the House not to enter into the question at length, but I trust that although I have been brief in my observations I have said enough to induce the House not to assent to the Resolution preferred by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. BOVILL said, he thought the House must be surprised at the charge made by the right hon. Gentleman against his hon. Friend, of raising expectations that could not be fulfilled, for if ever anyone had raised expectations upon the subject it was the right hon. Gentleman, when he declared that the Income Tax should not be permanent. Neither was it fair to say that, because the tax had been borne for twenty-two years, therefore the public had become habituated to it. The public had always deeply felt the inequalities and the injustice of the system; but they had tolerated them because they believed that the tax was not to be permanent. With respect to the Committee which had been appointed upon the Motion of his hon. Friend, he thought that there never was a Report which presented such unsatisfactory results. It admitted the inequalities, referred to evidence of which it gave no abstract, drew no conclusions, but printed the evidence at length. There was not a single gentleman of eminence examined who did not find fault with the mode in which the Income Tax was levied. The Report of the Committee was simply against the proposal of his hon. Friend, but the proposal now made by him was not of any particular plan, but was one which merely expressed the results of experience, and the opinions of most eminent statesmen. The tax had been tolerated in its present shape, because it was looked upon as a temporary tax, and therefore his hon. Friend was justified in proposing a Resolution—not an abstract Resolution, but one which would have practical operation—in order that if it should be intended to reimpose the tax and to make it permanent, some attempt should be made to remedy its admitted inequalities and injustice. He contended that it was not impossible to rectify the present unfair treatment of different classes of property. No one could justify the taxing of flesh and blood, brains and intellect, on the same principle as realized property. Every one must admit the injustice of taxing income dependent on age, health, mental and bodily infirmity, and all those circumstances which rendered income precarious, on the same principle as what was called spontaneous income. The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted the inequalities of the tax, but would make no attempt whatever to remedy its injustice and unfairness. The proposal of his hon. Friend was this—if they allowed these inequalities to continue, then the tax was not fit in its present state to be imposed as a permanent source of revenue. Did the Chancellor of the Exchequer say that no means could be adopted to remedy the inequalities of the tax as regarded income? Thousands of professional men felt the injustice of taxing their incomes, not only as compared with incomes derived from property alone, but also as compared with incomes from capital and trade. He knew by painful experience in the course of his profession, that the returns by traders of their income were not accurate. He had seen it particularly in cases in which they came forward to claim compensation for the loss of trade. A person by the present system might realize £100,000 in one year, and escape payment of the tax on that amount. What was the true principle on which taxation should proceed? The advocates of the Income Tax said that it taxed men according to their means; and, if that were so, they would have a principle of equality. But the tax sinned against the first principle of equality. It taxed not only the professional man's income, but his savings. The Committee reported not that there were no inequalities, injustice, and unfairness in the tax, but, all these being admitted, that the former plan of his hon. Friend was insufficient to remedy them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was good enough to tell them that if this plan were adopted there would still be anomalies; but did he mean to say that the grievances which existed could not be remedied? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud a few years ago, with considerable approval, drew a distinction between spontaneous income and that arising from the exercise of genius and intellect. He divided income into three classes—income derived from the possession of property, income derived from the possession of intellect, and income derived from combined property and intelligence—of which the merchant was an instance. Was there no practicability in that plan? Some scheme of that kind might easily be adopted. Suppose a tax of 6*d.* in the pound on income derived from realized property, there might be a scale of 2*d.* in the pound on income derived from professions, and an intermediate rate of 4*d.* on that derived from intellect and capital combined. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer, admitting all the inequalities of the tax, did not propose to adopt any remedy for them, and contented himself by rejecting as insufficient the present proposition, which, he said, was the same as that negatived by the Committee, but which only declared that with such recognized defects the tax was not fit to be imposed, contrary to the right hon. Gentleman's own promise, as a permanent source of revenue. He should support the Motion.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he had not intended to take any part in the discussion, but he could not allow the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman to pass without some notice. The hon. and learned Gentleman found fault with the Chancellor of the Exchequer because, on the strength of the evidence before him, that the plan formerly proposed by the hon. Member for Buckingham to his Select Committee would not answer, he proposed now to reject this new Resolution, which did not bind the House to that particular plan, but only to something which was perfectly vague and indefinite. The hon. and learned Gentleman said the Chancellor of the Exchequer was quite in the wrong if he called on the House to make the Income Tax a permanent part of our taxation without rectifying its inequalities. Now, in the first place, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not at present asking the House to make the Income Tax permanent. If the right hon. Gentleman were proposing a Bill for that purpose, or if they were discussing the details of an Income Tax measure, it would have been open to the

hon. Member for Buckingham, and to the hon. and learned Member for Guildford, to have proposed Amendments in order to have a discussion of a practical plan; and this would have brought the question to something like an issue. But how stood the case now? The Income Tax had existed some twenty-two or twenty-three years, and had been renewed sixteen or eighteen times. On the occasion of each of those renewals there had been an opportunity for revising the details of the tax. Nor were these the only opportunities which had offered. Various discussions had been raised at different times. On one occasion the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman)—on another the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had brought forward plans for its amendment. The late Mr. Hume had done so too. So had his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham himself. But none of the proposals which had been made had found acceptance in the House. The House had always found it impossible to make such alterations in the structure of the tax as would get rid of the present inequalities without introducing considerably greater evils. No one could deny that the Committee which was moved for by his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) had taken evidence which hit some of the blots of the present system, but the plan proposed by the hon. Gentleman was rejected by the Committee as unsuitable. The Committee did rather more than merely reject; for if his recollection served him right, they reported that the inequalities complained of were of the essence of the tax, and that it was hopeless to expect to be able to put the tax on a footing which would altogether get rid of inequalities. His hon. and learned Friend now proposed a scheme of his own—6*d.* per pound on realized property, 2*d.* per pound on professional incomes, and 4*d.* per pound on mixed incomes; but where was the line to be drawn? The whole question turned on the possibility of drawing a line between the higher rate and the lower rate, which should not occasion manifest injustice. Were all mixed incomes to be taxed alike? What was to be done if the income was derived chiefly from realized property, and but slightly from labour? What if from both in equal proportions? Who was to decide on the proportion? How were you to deal with sleeping partners? Those were some of the practical difficulties with which it was necessary to deal, and his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham had grappled with them with great skill; but when his witnesses before the Committee had been pressed in the matter, and asked how they would deal with this case and that case, they escaped the difficulty, and his hon. Friend escaped the difficulty by saying, "Oh, these are border cases. I want you to admit my general principle." He recollected a somewhat startling case which would serve as an illustration of the difficulties which had to be met. His hon. Friend laid down a principle to the following effect, that annuities were to be taxed on a different principle from interests arising out of land, and the case was put of a gentleman who in making provision for his two daughters, settled upon each of them an income of £1,000 a year for life at his death, the income of the one being by way of annuity purchased at an Insurance Office, and that of the other being derived from landed estate. That being so, the conclusion at which his hon. Friend had arrived in the maintenance of his theory was that of those two sisters possessing exactly the same income, the one was to be taxed at the rate of £37 a year, while the other would have to pay only £19. They were obliged, therefore, to say that the scheme proposed would bring about as many difficulties as existed under that sought to be got rid of. Joint stock companies were also to be treated on a different footing from private traders; and it came to this, that if two or three persons were carrying on a brewery, they were to be taxed according to one rate, and if they sold the concern to a joint stock company, the tax was to be different, and higher by one-third than the tax on the private firm. How could such distinctions between persons or firms engaged in active competition fail to operate unjustly and to cause heartburnings? He did not say that it was not a question into which the House might not be persuaded to look; but there were points in reference to it which ought to be fairly brought before them. If the hon. Member thought he had a better settlement of the Income Tax to propose, let him take a proper opportunity of doing so, but do not let the House condemn a tax which furnished a very important amount of revenue by passing a general Resolution, the effect of which would be simply to throw a vagueness and uncertainty over our financial system, without doing any good whatever. He thought that if the House looked at the matter upon the ground upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer placed it, when he appealed to them not to pass an abstract Resolution upon a question of this importance, they would see that nothing could be more inconvenient than to adopt a Resolution of this kind.

MR. HUBBARD: I have very few words to add to the discussion. The deserted condition of the House is less to be ascribed to a want of interest in the subject of taxation, as supposed by my right hon. Friend, than to the fact that dinner is a subject of still higher interest. I have no other point to notice in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In answer to the hon. Member for Stamford, I must remind him that the apparent anomaly to which he refers as an objection to my plan has been thoroughly explained, and the principle of the supposed case affirmed in the memoranda appended to the Report of 1861. That principle has been approved, and the provisions necessary to give it effect have been framed by one of the most acute and logical lawyers of our day; and it will remain superior to all impeachment, until the impeachment is supported by argument and demonstration. I entertain unflinching confidence in the ultimate triumph of right principles of taxation, although I may have to regret that the Vote of the House to-night will postpone the result which I desire.

Question put,

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

RESOLUTION.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: Sir, I rise to move—

"That in the opinion of this House the Rules sanctioned by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland on the 21st day of November, 1863, are, so far as regards their operation on the aid afforded to Convent and Monastic Schools, at variance with the principles of the system of National Education."

It is some years since there has been in this House any discussion upon the subject of the National System of Education in Ireland; and the question is one the importance of which it is hardly possible to overrate; for an establishment that receives from the Imperial revenue an annual grant of £316,000 deserves the careful consideration of this House as guardians of the public purse, and a system which educates, or undertakes to educate, something like 600,000 children, requires the superintendence and care of the Legislature of the country. In former discussions in this House attacks have been made upon the National system of Education, but the subject which I am anxious to bring under the attention of the House to-night is one in which the complainers are not the foes of the National System, but its warmest and most consistent friends; and the importance of the matters which have originated this complaint may be judged of by the House when I tell them, that the complaint has been made by the most prominent of those who have asserted that the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland have departed from its fundamental principles. The oldest, I think, or almost the oldest member of the Board of Commissioners is the Rev. Dr. Henry, the Principal of one of the Queen's Colleges, and this gentleman, after administering the system for twenty-five years, and speaking of the changes in the rules, the particulars of which I am going to state to the House, protested against them and said, "They amount to a departure from the fundamental rules of the system." I take the next one of the most consistent and oldest friends of the system, the Bishop of Derry, and he also protests against these rules as the introduction of a new principle, and he cannot, he says, "avoid expressing his dissatisfaction and alarm." I pass on to two of the Commissioners—Mr. Gibson and Mr. Hall—who are peculiarly the representatives of the Presbyterian body on the Board, and they likewise enter a protest against the changes in the rules; and then I find a deputation waiting on the Lord Lieutenant, headed by another earnest and consistent friend of the system, the Bishop of Down, and accompanied by a gentleman, whom we all remember as having been for many years a Member of this House, and who always took a part as a defender of the National System, Mr. Kirk, and that deputation states that "these rules as altered subvert the principle upon which the National System is based." But it does not stop there. I have yet to mention the right hon. Baronet, the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Robert Peel). The right hon. Baronet has always been in favour of, and has lent his aid to, this system, and I find him writing on behalf of the Government to the Board of Commissioners, and pointing out what he regards as a change in the fundamental rules of the Board, which must seriously imperil the principle upon which the system of education is based. Now, these are the friends of the system. I wish to say a few words as to my own feelings upon this question. I have had the opportunity of stating more than once in this House, that I have never joined those who have attacked this system of education. I believe that, in many respects, it might have been better constituted. I should have been glad if alterations could have been made to conciliate sooner objections which have been made to it; but of this I am satisfied, that the introduction of the system into Ireland has done incalculable good. And of this also I am satisfied, that no more perilous step could be taken towards the country than to overthrow the system. In the Motion of which I have given notice, I refer to certain schools in Ireland which are called "convent and monastic schools," and I have used those terms because I do not know how otherwise to describe them; but I have never in this House attempted, and I have always endeavoured to avoid, the mixing up of this question with denominational differences, and I should have been prepared to take the same course if these schools had belonged to a different denomination. This is not a question of difference between one denomination and another, but it is a question of the fundamental principle of the system itself. It is so long since there was any discussion on this point that perhaps the House will allow me to direct attention to the principle of the National System. The House will recollect that the origin of the system was in a letter addressed by the present Earl of Derby, then Mr. Stanley, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, to the Duke of Leinster. In that letter matters of principle were pointed out which were to govern the Board of Education, and I found the chief of these principles to have been—first, that the new system, while admitting children of all religious denominations to partake of its benefits, would not only make no effort for, but would avoid even the suspicion of proselytism; secondly, that in the schools instruction should be given to children of all churches, in the common branches of education, while they were to have separate instruction in the doctrines of their several creeds according to the appointment of their parents and guardians; and thirdly, that the teachers should be persons who had previously received instruction in model schools in connection with the Board, where the fundamental principles of the National System were carried out. These were certainly three of the fundamental features of the system of National education. I must explain also what the model schools were intended to be. Upon the establishment of the system, district model schools were erected, and there was a central model school in Dublin, the object being that they might train young persons to become teachers in the schools of the Board, and the House will understand the magnitude of the question when I tell them that the cost of the central model school was £17,000, and that of the provincial model schools £110,000, and the amount annually granted to the support of the model schools alone is £24,000. Now, any one who has observed the course of events in Ireland of late, will know that these model schools have been the objects of the special hostility of the prelates and clergy of the Roman Catholic Church. I do not complain of this hostility, for they have a right to manifest it; but the fact no one will deny. Proof of this may be found in the fact that while in the model schools there were 9,700 scholars, there were only 3,626, or about one-third, Roman Catholics on the books, and a very much smaller number in constant attendance, while in the ordinary schools there were 584,000 scholars, of whom 479,000 were Roman Catholics. I believe that in the model school at Sligo there was not a single Roman Catholic child either in attendance or on the books. At the same time that this opposition has been shown to the model schools, there has proceeded from the Roman Catholic Church a demand of a very urgent kind for a separate training of the teachers of the Roman Catholic children. I will show that the Board of Education have in reality granted this, while in name they have professed to refuse it; and I will rely on the admission of the Board itself, that the separate training of teachers is contrary to the principles of the Board, while in reality and substance the thing is done. It may be said by English Members, "What harm is there after all that there should be separate training for teachers of different denominations?" There would be no harm, provided the system were different from what it is. If the Irish system were like the English system there would not only be no objection, but the thing would be perfectly natural; but what we are dealing with, what we are anxious to preserve, is the essential principle of the Irish system, and the consequences of a separate training in Ireland would be such that I think the House should be very unwilling to assent to it. In the first place, if you accede to the demand of one denomination, you must accede to the demand of all for a separate training, and if you accede to that you must accede to the demand of all for a separate education. You cannot justify the separate training of teachers upon any principle which would not compel you to adopt a system of separate education. But that is not all. Of course, if I am right in saying that the object of the model schools built at so great a cost, and supported by so large an annual grant, was to secure the training of teachers and to provide teachers for other schools, the moment that you have separate training out of the model schools you will overthrow them. Still further, if you have separate training carried on, we will say by hypothesis, in the schools of the convents or monastic schools, the teachers there trained will be the only teachers which the Roman Catholic patrons will accept, and, virtually, the whole of the education of the Roman Catholic population of the country will be in the hands of teachers trained in these separate institutions. With this preface I will proceed to show to the House what the Commissioners have really done, and how they have met the demand for separate training. The first thing done by the Board was this. They began to apply to convent schools the system which has prevailed in other schools of appointing monitors, another name for junior or pupil-teachers. Not only are grants given to convent schools, but sums are given to pay the annual stipends to junior and senior monitors. But that was not enough, for it was found that the payment of these monitors extended only to persons of seventeen or eighteen years of age, and the Board had more recently created a new class of monitors whom they called first-class monitors, whom they describe to be young persons of an age when they become complete teachers, and who are to receive grants from the Board for their payment. That may be a judicious or an injudicious course, but it certainly constitutes a breach of a positive rule of the Board. How was it that convent schools originally became part of the schools of the Board? I find that the defence of the Commissioners rests upon this. They say that convent schools were always part of the schools of the Board, and that they are doing little more than was done at all times, and they ask how it is that they can be said to be altering the rules of the Board. I agree that convent schools were included in the schools of the Board; but I assert, and I may be set right if I am wrong by hon. Gentlemen opposite, that until 1855 there was no rule of the Board relaxed upon the face of it; convent schools submitted to all the rules of the Board; they accepted a grant, but it was on a different mode of remuneration, and with that exception prior to 1855 in the published rules of the Board there was no relaxation, convent schools being dealt with on the footing of other schools, or if anything was done it was without the knowledge of the public, and without any communication to Parliament. I now come to 1855. Down to the year 1855 the rule had been that no clerical person and no member of a religious order could be a teacher of a school under the control of the Board; but in that year the following rule was published for the first time:—

That was the first time the public were informed of an alteration in the rule. And did the change pass unnoticed? I find that in that year, and as soon as the new rule was published, a protest was signed against it on the part of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, upon the ground of its

"Creating an invidious distinction, and giving an undue advantage to one denomination, contrary to the previous principles of the Board."

And were they justified in making that protest? Why, I find that in the same rules it was declared that, if the Commissioners should consider a teacher in a non-vested school objectionable, they could withdraw his salary till a suitable teacher should be appointed, that teachers should be trained in a particular way, subject to the direction of the Board, and that they should be classified under certain classes. The teachers of convent schools were manifestly made exceptions to those rules. They were not liable to dismissal by the Board, or to have their grants suspended as the result of any examination, they were not trained or classified by the Board; and it was, therefore, perfectly true, as stated by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, that the new rule issued by the Board in 1855

"Created an invidious distinction and gave an undue advantage to one denomination."

But it was alleged by the Commissioners in their own defence, that they had always treated conventual schools in an exceptional manner. The opponents of the new practice observed, on the other hand, that the rules of the Commissioners had been relaxed in favour of convents in many particulars, not in form or in words merely, but in practice; and that subject was discussed in the course of a debate which took place in this House in the year 1856. During that debate I read extracts from evidence laid before a Committee of the other House in 1854, for the purpose of showing that convent schools were of necessity exclusively Roman Catholic. I quoted the statement of Archdeacon Stopford, a warm friend of the National System, that convent schools must, of course, be schools of separate education, and that it was equally impossible Protestants should send their children there as that Roman Catholics should send their children to schools where the teaching was exclusively Scriptural. Mr. Cross, the excellent and intelligent secretary of the Board, said he

"Should admit that convent schools must be looked upon as practically exclusive schools."

In the course of the same debate, I also adduced evidence to show that in the convent school at Youghal there were religious exercises every hour or half hour of the day, that Roman Catholic catechisms were at all times lying upon the desks, and notices were hung up calling attention to various dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church, and where eight Protestant children were found to be present on the day of inspection, the inducements consisting in the work that was taught and the price paid for it. These charges were taken from the Inspector's Report, formed the subject of investigation by the Board, and in their main features were all substantiated. But these are only instances of a universal practice. Every one who possesses any personal acquaintance with Ireland

is aware that these convent schools are strictly and exclusively the schools of one particular religious denomination. I readily admit that they are schools which are productive of great good, that in them the industrial education is most admirable, that the secular education, subject to some grave drawbacks and qualifications, is good, and that the teachers are remarkable for their disinterestedness and their charitableness; but I believe those ladies themselves would be the first to acknowledge that they would insist on teaching their own religion at all times in those schools. I find it was stated before the Committee of 1854, that it was a mere mockery to pretend that any person might at any moment obtain admission to those schools, because the doors were always kept closed, and fifteen or twenty minutes usually elapsed before admittance to them could be obtained by strangers. I mentioned these facts in the debate of the year 1856; and what was the course which the Government pursued upon that occasion? The noble Lord the present Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who at that time was not a Member of the Government though he sat on the Treasury Bench, undertook the duty of answering the attack made on the National Board, said that the cases which had been adduced appeared to be breaches of rules of the Board, and that he had no doubt that the Board would take care that a stop should be put to those proceedings. He did not justify these departures from rule, but admitted that they were errors which ought to be redressed. But the Board has since done nothing to retrace its steps, and the expectation held out by the noble Lord has not been in any way realized. There is another very remarkable fact to which I have to invite the attention of the House. We have lately heard a great deal of the suppression of the Reports of the School Inspectors in England; but the Reports of Inspectors in Ireland have been suppressed in a manner to which anything that has been done in this country is the merest trifle. It had been the practice of the Commissioners in Ireland to make annual Reports to this House. They are bound to do so. And they had also been in the habit, until within the last few years, of appending to their Reports the Reports of the head Inspectors of the different districts in the country. The Board produced these Reports without any abridgment. But they were also in the habit—and very properly — of prefixing to those documents a notice to the effect, that although they produced them they did not feel bound to indorse every statement they contained, or to carry out every recommendation the head Inspectors might make. The Reports of the head Inspectors were submitted to Parliament every year until 1861, but in that year for the first time those Reports were wholly omitted. The volume, however, lost nothing in bulk, the size of it being made up in a great measure by the insertion of the names of all the schools in the country ranged in a tabular form, without any comment, but with a statement on some of the tables that they were taken from the Reports of the Inspectors, not one word of which Reports were produced. The most remarkable Report, I believe, that ever came from a head Inspector was made in that year; but although it was made in 1861 it was not discovered until 1864, when, in compliance with a special Motion, it was laid before the House; and I now hold it in my hand. It is the Report of Mr. Sheridan, who is the head Inspector for about one-sixth of the whole of Ireland. His district lies in the south, where there is a great number of convent schools. He is himself a Roman Catholic; and he could not, therefore, entertain, in consequence of difference of religion, any feeling unfavourable to convent schools. He invited the special attention of the Board to his statement, and assured them that that statement referred to matters of which no mention had previously been made. He appears fairly to apportion praise and blame to these convent schools, and he goes on to state that thirty-five of them situated in the South of Ireland contain 9,015 pupils, or about one-fifth of the number of pupils in the whole 854 schools in his district. Mr. Sheridan said —

"These teachers are not classified by the Board, nor are they required to submit to an examination, as the Commissioners take for granted that they are sufficiently well educated to discharge the duties of national teachers efficiently; and, in point of fact, it is undeniable that the majority of them — of the nuns especially — are infinitely better educated than the teachers of ordinary National schools, while it is equally true that they bring to the discharge of their duties a disinterestedness and devotedness to which even the most zealous of the lay teachers can have no claim. It is also undeniable that their schools do an incalculable amount of good. Their pupils receive a moral and religious training of the highest order; they are educated to habits of truth-telling, modesty, order, and cleanliness, and such of

Mr. Sheridan having thus done justice to these schools, proceeded to notice two circumstances which seriously interfered with their efficiency:—

"These teachers very seldom have any opportunity of receiving a technical training as teachers, either before or after making their religious profession; and hence, although they are undoubtedly well educated in a general sense, I apprehend that many of them have a very limited acquaintance with those improved methods of teaching and school organization which have received the sanction of experience. The want of such technical knowledge is most apparent in their management of the junior classes. It is a characteristic of these teachers that they are impatient of competition. A rival school, if it can possibly be extinguished, is not allowed to exist. In crowded cities this is, of course, impossible; but in Tralee, Killarney, Newcastle, Kinsale, Queenstown, Middleton, Skibbereen, Bandon, Dingle, and a host of smaller towns, no female schools, except those connected with convents, are to be found; none are permitted to be established. In some of them, indeed, such as Tralee, Killarney, Newcastle, and Dingle, in which there are monks' schools as well as nuns' schools, even the ordinary male National schools have been proscribed."

Now, I am perfectly convinced that these teachers, in pursuing this course, are actuated by worthy motives of faith in themselves and a conscientious belief that when schools are opened adapted for the proper training of youth, they consider they are justified in using every influence to remove them out of the way. Such a course Mr. Sheridan describes as intolerant, and the evils which arise are more than sufficient to counterbalance any good they might effect; and he goes on to say that in very vast populations, where large proportions will attend schools of their own religious community, there was no inconsiderable number of them who attend lay schools that cannot be induced to attend these. That is, I say, they will not, although Roman Catholics, go to the schools, which belong to the conventual and monastic order; and Mr. Sheridan gives a remarkable instance, that in Killarney, where there are two convent schools and one monks' school, every other being proscribed, the consequence is that there are fewer children who go to school than those who do not go to school. The principle of emulation and competition is by this policy extinguished, and they are left to receive pupils without limit as to their teaching powers. The Board, Mr. Sheridan says, attending the operation of the existing Property and Income Tax disqualify it for being continuously reimposed in its present form as one of the means of levying the national revenue." I do not think the House of Commons will be disposed to adopt a Resolution of an abstract nature, especially upon such a subject. The experience we have had of abstract Resolutions upon questions of revenue has not been so inviting as to induce us to repeat the experiment now. Unsound in principle, they have been found inconvenient in practice. They are objectionable, because they involve the proceedings of this House in ambiguity, because they raise expectations which are afterwards disappointed, because they multiply and even embitter the causes of divided opinion and party conflict, always of necessity sufficiently numerous in a popular assembly. In my opinion, the arguments against these Resolutions were quite strong enough before the Resolution upon the Paper Duty, and the experiences which followed the adoption of that Resolution has afforded an additional lesson of warning against the repetition of the practice. Let the House deal as it can with taxes which affect the country, but let it promise nothing with respect to a tax except that which it is able and willing to perform. But my hon. Friend in proposing this abstract Resolution at the same time condemned it. The first half hour of his speech my hon. Friend employed in analyzing the present state of our taxation, and in showing that at least twenty millions in value of our indirect taxation ought to be greatly reduced or entirely abolished; that the tea duty should be largely reduced; that the sugar duties should be considerably reduced; that the coffee duty should be got rid of; that the pepper duty should be got rid of; and that the malt duty should be altogether abolished. Having had a ground for sweeping away a great portion of twenty millions of taxation we had a right to expect that the man who wrought such a work of ruin and desolation among the resources of the Exchequer would have devoted the rest of his speech to an endeavour to rebuild the edifice which he had cast down. It was with astonishment that I heard my hon. Friend not recommending any reduction of expenditure—and I never see my hon. Friend taking any part in a vote for reducing expenditure—but, not recommending any reduction of expenditure, he devoted the last moiety of his speech to urging upon the House to adopt a Resolution that eight millions more should be cut off from the Exchequer. I do not think that is a proper way of dealing with a matter of taxation. No doubt there are inequalities and evils attaching to the existing system of Income Tax, but let us not part with that tax until we know how to supply its place. Do not let us adopt a Resolution which holds out an expectation of parting with that tax until we have something in the nature of a practical scheme laid down and matured, by which we may be able to attain that much-desired consummation. I promised the House not to enter into the question at length, but I trust that although I have been brief in my observations I have said enough to induce the House not to assent to the Resolution preferred by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. BOVILL said, he thought the House must be surprised at the charge made by the right hon. Gentleman against his hon. Friend, of raising expectations that could not be fulfilled, for if ever anyone had raised expectations upon the subject it was the right hon. Gentleman, when he declared that the Income Tax should not be permanent. Neither was it fair to say that, because the tax had been borne for twenty-two years, therefore the public had become habituated to it. The public had always deeply felt the inequalities and the injustice of the system; but they had tolerated them because they believed that the tax was not to be permanent. With respect to the Committee which had been appointed upon the Motion of his hon. Friend, he thought that there never was a Report which presented such unsatisfactory results. It admitted the inequalities, referred to evidence of which it gave no abstract, drew no conclusions, but printed the evidence at length. There was not a single gentleman of eminence examined who did not find fault with the mode in which the Income Tax was levied. The Report of the Committee was simply against the proposal of his hon. Friend, but the proposal now made by him was not of any particular plan, but was one which merely expressed the results of experience, and the opinions of most eminent statesmen. The tax had been tolerated in its present shape, because it was looked upon as a temporary tax, and therefore his hon. Friend was justified in proposing a Resolution—not an abstract Resolution, but one which would have practical operation—in order that if it should be intended to reimpose the tax and to make it permanent, some attempt should be made to remedy its admitted inequalities and injustice. He contended that it was not impossible to rectify the present unfair treatment of different classes of property. No one could justify the taxing of flesh and blood, brains and intellect, on the same principle as realized property. Every one must admit the injustice of taxing income dependent on age, health, mental and bodily infirmity, and all those circumstances which rendered income precarious, on the same principle as what was called spontaneous income. The Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted the inequalities of the tax, but would make no attempt whatever to remedy its injustice and unfairness. The proposal of his hon. Friend was this—if they allowed these inequalities to continue, then the tax was not fit in its present state to be imposed as a permanent source of revenue. Did the Chancellor of the Exchequer say that no means could be adopted to remedy the inequalities of the tax as regarded income? Thousands of professional men felt the injustice of taxing their incomes, not only as compared with incomes derived from property alone, but also as compared with incomes from capital and trade. He knew by painful experience in the course of his profession, that the returns by traders of their income were not accurate. He had seen it particularly in cases in which they came forward to claim compensation for the loss of trade. A person by the present system might realize £100,000 in one year, and escape payment of the tax on that amount. What was the true principle on which taxation should proceed? The advocates of the Income Tax said that it taxed men according to their means; and, if that were so, they would have a principle of equality. But the tax sinned against the first principle of equality. It taxed not only the professional man's income, but his savings. The Committee reported not that there were no inequalities, injustice, and unfairness in the tax, but, all these being admitted, that the former plan of his hon. Friend was insufficient to remedy them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was good enough to tell them that if this plan were adopted there would still be anomalies; but did he mean to say that the grievances which existed could not be remedied? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud a few years ago, with considerable approval, drew a distinction between spontaneous income and that arising from the exercise of genius and intellect. He divided income into three classes—income derived from the possession of property, income derived from the possession of intellect, and income derived from combined property and intelligence—of which the merchant was an instance. Was there no practicability in that plan? Some scheme of that kind might easily be adopted. Suppose a tax of 6*d.* in the pound on income derived from realized property, there might be a scale of 2*d.* in the pound on income derived from professions, and an intermediate rate of 4*d.* on that derived from intellect and capital combined. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer, admitting all the inequalities of the tax, did not propose to adopt any remedy for them, and contented himself by rejecting as insufficient the present proposition, which, he said, was the same as that negatived by the Committee, but which only declared that with such recognized defects the tax was not fit to be imposed, contrary to the right hon. Gentleman's own promise, as a permanent source of revenue. He should support the Motion.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he had not intended to take any part in the discussion, but he could not allow the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman to pass without some notice. The hon. and learned Gentleman found fault with the Chancellor of the Exchequer because, on the strength of the evidence before him, that the plan formerly proposed by the hon. Member for Buckingham to his Select Committee would not answer, he proposed now to reject this new Resolution, which did not bind the House to that particular plan, but only to something which was perfectly vague and indefinite. The hon. and learned Gentleman said the Chancellor of the Exchequer was quite in the wrong if he called on the House to make the Income Tax a permanent part of our taxation without rectifying its inequalities. Now, in the first place, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not at present asking the House to make the Income Tax permanent. If the right hon. Member for Buckingham to his Select Committee would not answer, he proposed now to reject this new Resolution, which did not bind the House to that particular plan, but only to something which was perfectly vague and indefinite. The hon. and learned Gentleman said the Chancellor of the Exchequer was quite in the wrong if he called on the House to make the Income Tax a permanent part of our taxation without rectifying its inequalities. Now, in the first place, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not at present asking the House to make the Income Tax permanent. If the right hon. Gentleman were proposing a Bill for that purpose, or if they were discussing the details of an Income Tax measure, it would have been open to the

hon. Member for Buckingham, and to the hon. and learned Member for Guildford, to have proposed Amendments in order to have a discussion of a practical plan; and this would have brought the question to something like an issue. But how stood the case now? The Income Tax had existed some twenty-two or twenty-three years, and had been renewed sixteen or eighteen times. On the occasion of each of those renewals there had been an opportunity for revising the details of the tax. Nor were these the only opportunities which had offered. Various discussions had been raised at different times. On one occasion the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman)—on another the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) had brought forward plans for its amendment. The late Mr. Hume had done so too. So had his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham himself. But none of the proposals which had been made had found acceptance in the House. The House had always found it impossible to make such alterations in the structure of the tax as would get rid of the present inequalities without introducing considerably greater evils. No one could deny that the Committee which was moved for by his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) had taken evidence which hit some of the blots of the present system, but the plan proposed by the hon. Gentleman was rejected by the Committee as unsuitable. The Committee did rather more than merely reject; for if his recollection served him right, they reported that the inequalities complained of were of the essence of the tax, and that it was hopeless to expect to be able to put the tax on a footing which would altogether get rid of inequalities. His hon. and learned Friend now proposed a scheme of his own—6*d.* per pound on realized property, 2*d.* per pound on professional incomes, and 4*d.* per pound on mixed incomes; but where was the line to be drawn? The whole question turned on the possibility of drawing a line between the higher rate and the lower rate, which should not occasion manifest injustice. Were all mixed incomes to be taxed alike? What was to be done if the income was derived chiefly from realized property, and but slightly from labour? What if from both in equal proportions? Who was to decide on the proportion? How were you to deal with sleeping partners? These were some of the practical difficulties with which it was necessary to deal, and his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham had grappled with them with great skill; but when his witnesses before the Committee had been pressed in the matter, and asked how they would deal with this case and that case, they escaped the difficulty, and his hon. Friend escaped the difficulty by saying, "Oh, those are border cases. I want you to admit my general principle." He recollected a somewhat startling case which would serve as an illustration of the difficulties which had to be met. His hon. Friend laid down a principle to the following effect, that annuities were to be taxed on a different principle from interests arising out of land, and the case was put of a gentleman who in making provision for his two daughters, settled upon each of them an income of £1,000 a year for life at his death, the income of the one being by way of annuity purchased at an Insurance Office, and that of the other being derived from landed estate. That being so, the conclusion at which his hon. Friend had arrived in the maintenance of his theory was that of those two sisters possessing exactly the same income, the one was to be taxed at the rate of £37 a year, while the other would have to pay only £19. They were obliged, therefore, to say that the scheme proposed would bring about as many difficulties as existed under that sought to be got rid of. Joint stock companies were also to be treated on a different footing from private traders; and it came to this, that if two or three persons were carrying on a brewery, they were to be taxed according to one rate, and if they sold the concern to a joint stock company, the tax was to be different, and higher by one-third than the tax on the private firm. How could such distinctions between persons or firms engaged in active competition fail to operate unjustly and to cause heartburnings? He did not say that it was not a question into which the House might not be persuaded to look; but there were points in reference to it which ought to be fairly brought before them. If the hon. Member thought he had a better settlement of the Income Tax to propose, let him take a proper opportunity of doing so, but do not let the House condemn a tax which furnished a very important amount of revenue by passing a general Resolution, the effect of which would be simply to throw a vagueness and uncertainty over our financial system, without doing any good whatever. He thought that if the House looked at the matter upon the ground upon which the Chancellor of the Exchequer placed it, when he appealed to them not to pass an abstract Resolution upon a question of this importance, they would see that nothing could be more inconvenient than to adopt a Resolution of this kind.

MR. HUBBARD: I have very few words to add to the discussion. The deserted condition of the House is less to be ascribed to a want of interest in the subject of taxation, as supposed by my right hon. Friend, than to the fact that dinner is a subject of still higher interest. I have no other point to notice in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In answer to the hon. Member for Stamford, I must remind him that the apparent anomaly to which he refers as an objection to my plan has been thoroughly explained, and the principle of the supposed case affirmed in the memoranda appended to the Report of 1861. That principle has been approved, and the provisions necessary to give it effect have been framed by one of the most acute and logical lawyers of our day; and it will remain superior to all impeachment, until the impeachment is supported by argument and demonstration. I entertain unfailing confidence in the ultimate triumph of right principles of taxation, although I may have to regret that the Vote of the House to-night will postpone the result which I desire.

Question put,

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

RESOLUTION.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: Sir, I rise to move—

"That in the opinion of this House the Rules sanctioned by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland on the 21st day of November, 1863, are, so far as regards their operation on the aid afforded to Convent and Monastic Schools, at variance with the principles of the system of National Education."

It is some years since there has been in this House any discussion upon the subject of the National System of Education in Ireland; and the question is one the importance of which it is hardly possible to overrate; for an establishment that receives from the Imperial revenue an annual grant of £316,000 deserves the careful consideration of this House as guardians of the public purse, and a system which educates, or undertakes to educate, something like 600,000 children, requires the superintendence and care of the Legislature of the country. In former discussions in this House attacks have been made upon the National system of Education, but the subject which I am anxious to bring under the attention of the House to-night is one in which the complainers are not the foes of the National System, but its warmest and most consistent friends; and the importance of the matters which have originated this complaint may be judged of by the House when I tell them, that the complaint has been made by the most prominent of those who have asserted that the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland have departed from its fundamental principles. The oldest, I think, or almost the oldest member of the Board of Commissioners is the Rev. Dr. Henry, the Principal of one of the Queen's Colleges, and this gentleman, after administering the system for twenty-five years, and speaking of the changes in the rules, the particulars of which I am going to state to the House, protested against them and said, "They amount to a departure from the fundamental rules of the system." I take the next one of the most consistent and oldest friends of the system, the Bishop of Derry, and he also protests against these rules as the introduction of a new principle, and he cannot, he says, "avoid expressing his dissatisfaction and alarm." I pass on to two of the Commissioners—Mr. Gibson and Mr. Hall—who are peculiarly the representatives of the Presbyterian body on the Board, and they likewise enter a protest against the changes in the rules; and then I find a deputation waiting on the Lord Lieutenant, headed by another earnest and consistent friend of the system, the Bishop of Down, and accompanied by a gentleman, whom we all remember as having been for many years a Member of this House, and who always took a part as a defender of the National System, Mr. Kirk, and that deputation states that "these rules as altered subvert the principle upon which the National System is based." But it does not stop there. I have yet to mention the right hon. Baronet, the Chief Secretary for

Ireland (Sir Robert Peel). The right hon. Baronet has always been in favour of, and has lent his aid to, this system, and I find him writing on behalf of the Government to the Board of Commissioners, and pointing out what he regards as a change in the fundamental rules of the Board, which must seriously imperil the principle upon which the system of education is based. Now, these are the friends of the system. I wish to say a few words as to my own feelings upon this question. I have had the opportunity of stating more than once in this House, that I have never joined those who have attacked this system of education. I believe that, in many respects, it might have been better constituted. I should have been glad if alterations could have been made to conciliate sooner objections which have been made to it; but of this I am satisfied, that the introduction of the system into Ireland has done incalculable good. And of this also I am satisfied, that no more perilous step could be taken towards the country than to overthrow the system. In the Motion of which I have given notice, I refer to certain schools in Ireland which are called "convent and monastic schools," and I have used those terms because I do not know how otherwise to describe them; but I have never in this House attempted, and I have always endeavoured to avoid, the mixing up of this question with denominational differences, and I should have been prepared to take the same course if these schools had belonged to a different denomination. This is not a question of difference between one denomination and another, but it is a question of the fundamental principle of the system itself. It is so long since there was any discussion on this point that perhaps the House will allow me to direct attention to the principle of the National System. The House will recollect that the origin of the system was in a letter addressed by the present Earl of Derby, then Mr. Stanley, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, to the Duke of Leinster. In that letter matters of principle were pointed out which were to govern the Board of Education, and I found the chief of these principles to have been—first, that the new system, while admitting children of all religious denominations to partake of its benefits, would not only make no effort for, but would avoid even the suspicion of proselytism; secondly, that in the schools instruction should be given to children of all churches, in the common branches of education, while they were to have separate instruction in the doctrines of their several creeds according to the appointment of their parents and guardians; and thirdly, that the teachers should be persons who had previously received instruction in model schools in connection with the Board, where the fundamental principles of the National System were carried out. These were certainly three of the fundamental features of the system of National education. I must explain also what the model schools were intended to be. Upon the establishment of the system, district model schools were erected, and there was a central model school in Dublin, the object being that they might train young persons to become teachers in the schools of the Board, and the House will understand the magnitude of the question when I tell them that the cost of the central model school was £17,000, and that of the provincial model schools £110,000, and the amount annually granted to the support of the model schools alone is £24,000. Now, any one who has observed the course of events in Ireland of late, will know that these model schools have been the objects of the special hostility of the prelates and clergy of the Roman Catholic Church. I do not complain of this hostility, for they have a right to manifest it; but the fact no one will deny. Proof of this may be found in the fact that while in the model schools there were 9,700 scholars, there were only 3,626, or about one-third, Roman Catholics on the books, and a very much smaller number in constant attendance, while in the ordinary schools there were 584,000 scholars, of whom 479,000 were Roman Catholics. I believe that in the model school at Sligo there was not a single Roman Catholic child either in attendance or on the books. At the same time that this opposition has been shown to the model schools, there has proceeded from the Roman Catholic Church a demand of a very urgent kind for a separate training of the teachers of the Roman Catholic children. I will show that the Board of Education have in reality granted this, while in name they have professed to refuse it; and I will rely on the admission of the Board itself, that the separate training of teachers is contrary to the principles of the Board, while in reality and substance the thing is done. It may be said by English Members, "What harm is there after all that

plete teachers, and who are to receive grants from the Board for their payment. That may be a judicious or an injudicious course, but it certainly constitutes a breach of a positive rule of the Board. How was it that convent schools originally became part of the schools of the Board? I find that the defence of the Commissioners rests upon this. They say that convent schools were always part of the schools of the Board, and that they are doing little more than was done at all times, and they ask how it is that they can be said to be altering the rules of the Board. I agree that convent schools were included in the schools of the Board; but I assert, and I may be set right if I am wrong by hon. Gentlemen opposite, that until 1855 there was no rule of the Board relaxed upon the face of it; convent schools submitted to all the rules of the Board; they accepted a grant, but it was on a different mode of remuneration, and with that exception prior to 1855 in the published rules of the Board there was no relaxation, convent schools being dealt with on the footing of other schools, or if anything was done it was without the knowledge of the public, and without any communication to Parliament. I now come to 1855. Down to the year 1855 the rule had been that no clerical person and no member of a religious order could be a teacher of a school under the control of the Board; but in that year the following rule was published for the first time:—

That was the first time the public were informed of an alteration in the rule. And did the change pass unnoticed? I find that in that year, and as soon as the new rule was published, a protest was signed against it on the part of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, upon the ground of its

"Creating an invidious distinction, and giving an undue advantage to one denomination, contrary to the previous principles of the Board."

And were they justified in making that protest? Why, I find that in the same rules it was declared that, if the Commissioners should consider a teacher in a non-vested school objectionable, they could withdraw his salary till a suitable teacher should be appointed, that teachers should be trained in a particular way, subject to the direction of the Board, and that they should be classified under certain classes. The teachers of convent schools were manifestly made exceptions to those rules. They were not liable to dismissal by the Board, or to have their grants suspended as the result of any examination, they were not trained or classified by the Board; and it was, therefore, perfectly true, as stated by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, that the new rule issued by the Board in 1855

But it was alleged by the Commissioners in their own defence, that they had always treated conventual schools in an exceptional manner. The opponents of the new practice observed, on the other hand, that the rules of the Commissioners had been relaxed in favour of convents in many particulars, not in form or in words merely, but in practice; and that subject was discussed in the course of a debate which took place in this House in the year 1856. During that debate I read extracts from evidence laid before a Committee of the other House in 1854, for the purpose of showing that convent schools were of necessity exclusively Roman Catholic. I quoted the statement of Archdeacon Stopford, a warm friend of the National System, that convent schools must, of course, be schools of separate education, and that it was equally impossible Protestants should send their children there as that Roman Catholics should send their children to schools where the teaching was exclusively Scriptural. Mr. Cross, the excellent and intelligent secretary of the Board, said he

"Should admit that convent schools must be looked upon as practically exclusive schools."

In the course of the same debate, I also adduced evidence to show that in the convent school at Youghal there were religious exercises every hour or half hour of the day, that Roman Catholic catechisms were at all times lying upon the desks, and notices were hung up calling attention to various dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church, and where eight Protestant children were found to be present on the day of inspection, the inducements consisting in the work that was taught and the price paid for it. These charges were taken from the Inspector's Report, formed the subject of investigation by the Board, and in their main features were all substantiated. But these are only instances of a universal practice. Every one who possesses any personal acquaintance with Ireland

is aware that these convent schools are strictly and exclusively the schools of one particular religious denomination. I readily admit that they are schools which are productive of great good, that in them the industrial education is most admirable, that the secular education, subject to some grave drawbacks and qualifications, is good, and that the teachers are remarkable for their disinterestedness and their charitableness; but I believe those ladies themselves would be the first to acknowledge that they would insist on teaching their own religion at all times in those schools. I find it was stated before the Committee of 1854, that it was a mere mockery to pretend that any person might at any moment obtain admission to those schools, because the doors were always kept closed, and fifteen or twenty minutes usually elapsed before admittance to them could be obtained by strangers. I mentioned these facts in the debate of the year 1856; and what was the course which the Government pursued upon that occasion? The noble Lord the present Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who at that time was not a Member of the Government though he sat on the Treasury Bench, undertook the duty of answering the attack made on the National Board, said that the cases which had been adduced appeared to be breaches of rules of the Board, and that he had no doubt that the Board would take care that a stop should be put to those proceedings. He did not justify these departures from rule, but admitted that they were errors which ought to be redressed. But the Board has since done nothing to retrace its steps, and the expectation held out by the noble Lord has not been in any way realized. There is another very remarkable fact to which I have to invite the attention of the House. We have lately heard a great deal of the suppression of the Reports of the School Inspectors in England; but the Reports of Inspectors in Ireland have been suppressed in a manner to which anything that has been done in this country is the merest trifle. It had been the practice of the Commissioners in Ireland to make annual Reports to this House. They are bound to do so. And they had also been in the habit, until within the last few years, of appending to their Reports the Reports of the head Inspectors of the different districts in the country. The Board produced these Reports without any abridgment. But they were also in the habit—and

very properly — of prefixing to those documents a notice to the effect, that although they produced them they did not feel bound to indorse every statement they contained, or to carry out every recommendation the head Inspectors might make. The Reports of the head Inspectors were submitted to Parliament every year until 1861, but in that year for the first time those Reports were wholly omitted. The volume, however, lost nothing in bulk, the size of it being made up in a great measure by the insertion of the names of all the schools in the country ranged in a tabular form, without any comment, but with a statement on some of the tables that they were taken from the Reports of the Inspectors, not one word of which Reports were produced. The most remarkable Report, I believe, that ever came from a head Inspector was made in that year; but although it was made in 1861 it was not discovered until 1864, when, in compliance with a special Motion, it was laid before the House; and I now hold it in my hand. It is the Report of Mr. Sheridan, who is the head Inspector for about one-sixth of the whole of Ireland. His district lies in the south, where there is a great number of convent schools. He is himself a Roman Catholic; and he could not, therefore, entertain, in consequence of difference of religion, any feeling unfavourable to convent schools. He invited the special attention of the Board to his statement, and assured them that that statement referred to matters of which no mention had previously been made. He appears fairly to apportion praise and blame to these convent schools, and he goes on to state that thirty-five of them situated in the South of Ireland contain 9,015 pupils, or about one-fifth of the number of pupils in the whole 854 schools in his district. Mr. Sheridan said—

"These teachers are not classified by the Board, nor are they required to submit to an examination, as the Commissioners take for granted that they are sufficiently well educated to discharge the duties of national teachers efficiently; and, in point of fact, it is undeniable that the majority of them—of the nuns especially—are infinitely better educated than the teachers of ordinary National schools, while it is equally true that they bring to the discharge of their duties a disinterestedness and devotedness to which even the most zealous of the lay teachers can have no claim. It is also undeniable that their schools do an incalculable amount of good. Their pupils receive a moral and religious training of the highest order; they are educated to habits of truth-telling, modesty, order, and cleanliness, and such of

Mr. Sheridan having thus done justice to these schools, proceeded to notice two circumstances which seriously interfered with their efficiency:—

"These teachers very seldom have any opportunity of receiving a technical training as teachers, either before or after making their religious profession; and hence, although they are undoubtedly well educated in a general sense, I apprehend that many of them have a very limited acquaintance with those improved methods of teaching and school organization which have received the sanction of experience. The want of such technical knowledge is most apparent in their management of the junior classes. It is a characteristic of these teachers that they are impatient of competition. A rival school, if it can possibly be extinguished, is not allowed to exist. In crowded cities this is, of course, impossible; but in Tralee, Killarney, Newcastle, Kinsale, Queenstown, Middleton, Skibbereen, Bandon, Dingle, and a host of smaller towns, no female schools, except those connected with convents, are to be found; none are permitted to be established. In some of them, indeed, such as Tralee, Killarney, Newcastle, and Dingle, in which there are monks' schools as well as nuns' schools, even the ordinary male National schools have been proscribed."

Now, I am perfectly convinced that these teachers, in pursuing this course, are actuated by worthy motives of faith in themselves and a conscientious belief that when schools are opened adapted for the proper training of youth, they consider they are justified in using every influence to remove them out of the way. Such a course Mr. Sheridan describes as intolerant, and the evils which arise are more than sufficient to counterbalance any good they might effect; and he goes on to say that in very vast populations, where large proportions will attend schools of their own religious community, there was no inconsiderable number of them who attend lay schools that cannot be induced to attend these. That is, I say, they will not, although Roman Catholics, go to the schools, which belong to the conventual and monastic order; and Mr. Sheridan gives a remarkable instance, that in Killarney, where there are two convent schools and one monks' school, every other being proscribed, the consequence is that there are fewer children who go to school than those who do not go to school. The principle of emulation and competition is by this policy extinguished, and they are left to receive pupils without limit as to their teaching powers. The Board, Mr. Sheridan says, deals with these schools differently from the others, for whilst they remunerate the teachers of the others by a stipend and the supply of school materials, they pay the convent schools by a capitation grant, the direct and positive object of which is to get as many children as possible crowded into these schools. The attendance, he says, instead of being restricted to the number of children the schools are capable of accommodating practically, is crowded to excess, and the attendance being out of proportion to the teaching powers, the rate of progress is consequently so slow that it takes a long time for a child to work its way from the lowest to the highest class, and, in point of fact, comparatively few reach that class, for the great majority of the children leave the schools before they have completed half their school course. Mr. Sheridan suggests three remedies for this state of things—first, a better organization with regard to numbers; secondly, the appointment of lay teachers; and thirdly, more efficient inspection. But then he went on to say that no improvement in organization and no amount of skill would make one teacher do the work of two, or ten do the work of fifteen. Could any one doubt when Parliament was asked to give large capitation grants, that they should have been made acquainted with that Report. It was a breach of duty not to communicate it to Parliament. But the matter did not stop there. Mr. Sheridan had said—

“It is not my intention, however, just now to enter at greater length into the state of these schools and their teachers, as I have it in contemplation to inspect all the other convent schools in my district, and, when I have time, to make them the subject of a special Report. There are, however, two circumstances I must mention which cannot but interfere with their functions—one is, that these teachers have no opportunity of receiving educational training as teachers either before or after making their profession of faith, although they are well educated in a general sense, and they have necessarily a limited acquaintance with those methods of training and school organization which have received the sanction of experience, and the want of which is apparent in the management of these schools.”

Different opinions, however, prevail with regard to Mr. Sheridan's Report. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: Hear, hear!] My hon. Friend below the gangway is evidently more disposed to differ from it than I am; but no one can doubt it is a Report that ought to have been communicated to Parliament, and that when we were asked annually to give large capitation grants,

we should have been told what the Board knew the confidential Inspector had informed them, and which Mr. Sheridan describes as unpleasant truths, and all the more unpleasant now that they are offered for the first time, and it was a dereliction of duty not to have communicated them to Parliament. But the matter goes further than that. A short time since I asked the Attorney General for Ireland, who represents the Board in this House, whether Mr. Sheridan had made his promised further Report, or whether orders had been given to him to make it, and the right hon. Gentleman said he had not made it, and that he had not received orders not to make it. I do not care which horn of the dilemma the Commissioners choose to adopt, as one seems quite as bad as the other. There are many ways by which an Inspector might be led to understand it is better not to make a Report until it has been promised. But if there were not, have the Commissioners discharged their duty in not calling upon him for his promised Report, in order that the truth might be known? In the rules which were made last year the Commissioners determined to act upon the principle that these convent schools should be efficient first-class schools, and they gave them that character in their Report and in their rules, in the face of Mr. Sheridan's Report, which they concealed. As soon as they had made these rules, and had come to the conclusion to publish them to the world, this Report was discovered, and they were forced to produce it, and they then instructed the other district Inspectors to inspect and report upon the other convent schools. Having given these schools the character they asserted belonged to them, they directed the other Inspectors to report, which is very like to deciding first and inquiring after. In the meantime the pressure from the Roman Catholic prelates and clergy for a separate system of training went on; and it is now confessed, on the part of the Board, that before any new rules were made they yielded to the pressure by appointing monitors and teachers to the convent schools, which is a direct breach of their own rules. For how did the rules stand before the month of November last. Before that time the members of the convents might discharge the duties of literary teachers, either by themselves or by the aid of such others as they might choose to employ, the salaries of such teachers to be defrayed by the communities; but by the proposed new rules it is provided that in schools where the teacher does not rank at least in the third class he can have the assistance of a junior monitor, and where the teacher does not rank at least in the second class he is to be allowed the services of a senior monitor. Now there is no teacher in the convent schools in the second or third class. I call upon the Board to show by what authority they violated the old rules. The new rules have not yet been acted upon, and the present moment is the most fitting for considering the question, because in a few days the House will be asked to grant a sum of money, which is to give effect to these new rules. There are only three of these rules to which I need refer. The old rule the House will remember, as I have already said, was that the members of the convent schools might, if convenient, discharge the duties of literary teachers by themselves or others, the salaries of such assistants to be defrayed by the community, and then there is inserted, for the first time, except in the case of monitors. That is to say, they really prohibit teachers in any convent school except those who are paid by the Board. The next alteration is this. Under the head of convent schools the rule says that schools of this class are entitled to the services of paid monitors. But the third alteration is the great one, whether as regards the singular manner in which it is framed or in the alteration which it makes. And when the House hears this rule I think they will see that the alarm which it created is not altogether unfounded. At first sight the rule may appear to be harmless enough. It is this—

"In the case of a few very large and highly efficient schools the Commissioners are prepared to appoint young persons of great merit to act as first class monitors, with a rate of salary higher than the rate of salaries of the above grades."

Now, in the first place, I ask, is this the proper way to make a rule to be enforced in the country and to be acted upon? The Board is to appoint young persons of great merit without describing how that merit is to be discovered; and, finally, at a salary somewhat larger than the paid monitors, without stating the excess of such salary. I have got the admission of the Board of Education itself that this rule was intended to meet the case of convent schools, and practically it meets no other case. I should be sorry to suppose that gentlemen of the eminence of those who compose the Board could have used words to conceal their real intentions. But they must be now aware that, knowing the purposes for which this rule was intended, it is most unhappily expressed, and gives rise to the suggestion that it was couched in these terms in order that persons should not know what it was intended for. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman the Commissioner of Education to state to the House, that putting aside the case of model schools, for which there was no pretence to apply this rule, that there is any school in Ireland within the mind and view of the Commissioners to which the rule will apply other than convent schools. I say there is none. If there be one either it is a school in the North of Ireland which is described as a large school. To that alone could the epithet be ascribed. I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to say there is any other school to which it will apply. But whether he accepts the challenge or not, I have the confession of the Commissioners, that it was intended to apply to the convent schools chiefly. Now what would be the effect of this rule if acted upon? They would have junior monitors and senior monitors paid by the Board. They would first have their capitulation grant in respect to their pupils. They would then have the monitors, both junior and senior, paid by the Board. Then they would have a new class not heard of before—the first class monitors—the object of which was, that they may be trained as teachers to go out to other Roman Catholic schools in the neighbourhood. The result would be that you would have a separate training establishment where the expense of separate training was defrayed by the State. You would have in substance and reality, the very thing that the Board said when they were asked on the subject they were not at liberty to grant. But what is the effect on the model schools? We have got the estimate upon the table prepared under the direction of the Board, which must soon come under the consideration of the House. And what do I find there? I find that there are struck off from monitors and pupil-teachers exactly the number which makes the diminution of the grant of £2,011. Monitors and pupil-teachers are annihilated to that amount, and a grant requested for these first-class monitors in convent schools of £2,000. So that that amount is actually given to the convent schools which was withdrawn from the model schools. Now, what is the justification of the Commissioners upon this point? The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, on being waited upon by a deputation, referred to the Commissioners for their observations upon this question. They have furnished his Excellency with an explanatory paper, which has been laid upon the table. Now, I will venture to say, though representing the Commissioners, that there never emanated from any public department a document to be paralleled with this for recklessness and audacity. In the first place, the Commissioners say there is a perfect distinction between monitors and teachers, and that monitors are not teachers at all. Now, I will judge them by their own rules. I will take two passages only from their defence. Under the head of "classification of teachers" occurs this rule—

"Besides the principal and assistant teachers included under the foregoing head, there are other junior literary and industrial assistant teachers, pupil-teachers, and paid monitors."

And the Commissioners in the same document, forgetting their own rule, assert that the teachers, assistants, and monitors are perfectly different things; and under a rule which prohibited paid teachers the Commissioners say that they are at liberty to have paid monitors. But the second observation of the Commissioners is still more remarkable. They say, as to the district model schools being injured, that they were never intended as training establishments for teachers, and that it is quite a mistake to suppose that it entered into their conception to support model establishments as training schools. Let me read their own words, for I will ask the right hon. Gentleman to give an explanation, for without an explanation it appears to me to be an audacious evasion of the rule on the part of the Commissioners. I will ask the House to judge between us. These are their words—

"The district model schools are never intended to be training establishments for teachers."

Now, this is a short, clear, and pithy assertion of a fact. Before the echo of that sentence dies away we may read this rule. Under the head of "District Model Schools" they say—

"The chief object of model schools is to promote a united education, to communicate a literary and scientific education, and to train young persons for the office of teachers."

Sir Hugh Cairns

In the same page the Commissioners say that they were never intended for training establishments for teachers. Well, I will now take up the covenant which occurs in all model school leases—in the leases of all the schools under the Board. I find that it is to this effect—it binds all teachers, male and female, teaching in schools connected with the Board, to hold themselves in readiness to attend when called upon at the normal establishment in Dublin, or at one of the district model schools hereafter to be opened, for the purpose of training. I have here before me the correspondence which had taken place between the resident Commissioner and Mr. Wynne, once a Member of this House, and a gentleman we all respect; and in that correspondence I find that Mr. Wynne complained of the manner in which the teachers in the model schools in Sligo were distributed amongst the various denominations. The answer which the Commissioner gave to this complaint was that the district model school is not the model school of a mere town or village in which it is placed, but of the whole district, for the purpose of preparing the future teachers for the 400 or 500 National schools of the district. Now, nearly all of those schools were Roman Catholic ones that lay within that district. But I ask, then, what is the justification for the statement made to the Lord Lieutenant as to a matter of fact? What is the next explanation they give? They say that the district model schools do not supply a sufficient number of teachers, and the object of this rule is to increase that supply. Now, let the House mark the consistency of those statements. What are the facts? The Commissioners say that they amount to 700 teachers a year, and that the model schools only give 130 a year. I will ask the right hon. Gentleman for some warranty for this surprising statement. I find that Mr. Inspector Newall, one of the head Inspectors, says that he cannot get places for his teachers in his district—that one-sixth of the whole only amount to forty in the year; so that, multiplying that number by six, you get the number 240 in place of 130, which the Commissioners say the model schools only give. I also find that in Belfast alone the schools turned out sixty-three teachers in 1861, and seventy-six in 1862, and this is only one of the seventeen model schools in Ireland. I want then to know, if the object of these model schools be to supply a sufficiency of teachers, how that is to be done, inasmuch as I have before observed that the Commissioners have reduced the estimate for the model schools by the sum intended to meet and satisfy the rule of which I complain. But there is another explanation given by the Commissioners. They say that the convent schools have only a small capitation allowance, and that that does not produce as much money as the capitation allowances in other schools; that consequently the teachers in the convent schools are worse off in point of salary than those of other schools, and that it is, therefore, unfair to grudge them this little addition to which I have alluded. But why are they worse off in this respect? They are worse off because they refuse to submit to the rules laid down. If they submitted to those rules they would get exactly the same allowance as other schools. Are they then unfairly paid, and does the country exact from them a cheaper rate of education than from other schools? The Commissioners say that each child in a convent school costs 4s. 6d. altogether, and that each child in any of the other schools costs 7s. 2d. That is to say, the convent school child costs a little more than half what the other school child costs. But Mr. Sheridan says that the children in the convent schools are not half taught; that one teacher does the work of two; and that the inevitable result in such schools is that the rate of progress is extremely slow; that it takes a long time for a child to work his way from the lowest to the highest classes, and that the majority of the children leave the schools before they have completed their education. He says that no improvement in the school will enable one teacher to do the work of two. Now, am I justified in the statement which I made to the House? Then do not tell me that the State pays 4s. 6d. a head in one school, and 7s. 2d. a head in another school, when I am distinctly told that the child in one school is only half taught, and that the school has only one-half of the teaching power they ought to have. What are the protests against the National system? One of the Commissioners said that the rule limiting the allowance to convent schools was made to meet isolated cases; and Dr. Henry, the oldest Commissioner on the Board, said that, in his humble judgment, the recent change in the rule seriously interfered with one of the fundamental principles relating to secular instruction, and that it fostered a spirit of separation and exclusiveness. I invite the House to a passage between the Board of Commissioners and the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I shall even claim the vote of the right hon. Baronet. I find that on the 30th January this year the right hon. Baronet wrote to the Resident Commissioner in these terms—

“Sir,—The attention of the Irish Government has been drawn to certain contemplated changes in the fundamental rules of the system of national education in Ireland, the effect of which would be seriously to imperil the principles on which the system is based. I have to remind you that the Board has no power to change any fundamental rule without the express permission of his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant.”

This is much more clear than what I have put before the House. The answer of the Commissioners really raises a question the importance of which this House will see, and the House must determine whether they will have a control and authority over the Board of Commissioners or not. The Commissioners disown control. In their answer there are one or two very curious things. Although there is not a word in the secretary's letter relative to convent schools, or any enumeration of the changes which the right hon. Baronet conceived to be fundamental, the Commissioners accept the suggestions and the insinuations, and they at once enter into the question of the convent schools. They say, “Oh, it is the convent schools you are speaking of;” and they tell the Chief Secretary it is no business of his. They say, moreover, they are quite sure that the Lord Lieutenant will agree with them. They further say, “We don't care for either you or the Lord Lieutenant, because the only thing we have to do is to get our money from Parliament, if we can only scramble through the Estimates”—I call the particular attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to this—“If we can only scramble through the Estimates and get the money from Parliament, we may spend it in any way we like; and with anything connected with the spending of money you have nothing to do.” The House will consider the relations which exist between it and the Board, who receive £16,000 a year, and they will consider the extent of the information contained in the Estimate. The secretaries to the Commission, in reply to the right hon. Baronet, wrote as follows:—

"That though it seems to them there is nothing in the charter of incorporation forbidding the change of any rule of the Board, they are aware that, by one of the rules which were approved by the Government in 1855, it is provided that the Commissioners are not to change any fundamental rule without the express permission of his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant. We are directed further to state that, in approving the recent rules, supposed to be referred to by you, the Commissioners are of opinion that in so doing they made no change in any fundamental rule; and they are disposed to think that the Lord Lieutenant—to whom, in answer to his Excellency's letter of the 23rd ult., they have now forwarded a communication on the subject of these rules—will concur with them in this opinion."

Then they proceeded to lay down four fundamental rules, and I should very much like to know where they got them from. Certainly there is no document before Parliament which contains them. These are the rules—

"1st, Those rules which protect the children from interference with their religious opinions; 2nd, those rules which entitle the pastors to give religious instruction to children in vested schools; 3rd, those rules which regulate and confirm the rights of the patron, and the succession in case of a vacancy; 4th, the rules which give to managers the right to use the schools, or to the public the right to visit them, in order to see that they are properly carried on."

They contend that these rules are not fundamental. I however understand these rules to be fundamental in this way, that they are solemnly established by the Board, and published to the world, as are the rules with regard to teachers, and with regard to convent schools—the one as much as the other. But so shortsighted are the Commissioners that they actually forget that if they are right in saying these four rules are not fundamental, and that therefore they may be changed without the consent of the Lord Lieutenant, the result will be that the very rule which says that fundamental rules cannot be changed without his consent is not itself fundamental and might itself be changed. That, I think, is not an argument that can be sustained for a moment. They went on to speak of the taxpayers and the House of Commons. This makes it proper for me to ask the House to observe that to the Estimate for this year there is appended a Vote relative to the creation of first-class monitors. The House knows pretty well what the class was created for. It was created for the convent schools, and for training teachers in the way I have pointed out. This is the information for the taxpayers. The note is—

"In order to perfect the monitorial system the Committee are convinced it is necessary to extend somewhat the period of monitorial service where special aptitude is manifested either for training teachers or for receiving the instruction."

Do the Commissioners mean to say that the ladies at the head of nunneries, who never have been trained for teaching, who have never been put in possession of the technicalities of teaching, are peculiarly qualified to instruct pupil-teachers? I have no doubt that the time is coming, and that it is coming very fast, in which the House will have to consider the constitution of this Board, if it desires to retain the system of National Education in Ireland. Originally the Board consisted of seven Commissioners. The number was subsequently increased to ten, and later still to twenty. Only imagine a system of education in England conducted by twenty persons selected from different parts of the country who could never be got together! The result must be that the whole executive management must be left to clerks or cliques of a limited number of the Committee. The subject has before occupied attention. Mr. Cross, the secretary, appeared before a Committee of the House of Lords, and said a numerous Board was very undesirable, that three Commissioners were enough, and ten too many. The Bishop of Derry also said he was satisfied, from experience and observation, that if the system was to be saved there must be three paid Commissioners in the place of the present Board. Practically, this happens: in Dublin there are six, seven, or eight Commissioners—one in Belfast, one in Derry, and so forth; and the difficulty of getting them together is so great that the Dublin Commissioners do the whole business. I have brought this question before the House, this being a branch of the Legislature which has always been desirous to promote Irish education. If I wished the National system to fail, the best way would be to let it alone. I believe that two years would, in that case, overthrow the system to a certainty; but if the House desires to retain the system in the efficiency and spirit which has hitherto attended it, I call on the House, while yet there is time, to show the Commissioners that their course is one in which they will not be supported by the House, and to do so by affirming my Resolution.

MR. DAWSON said, he begged to second the Motion. He had always been of opinion that the true and only groundwork of a National System of Education in Ireland must be based on the Earl of Derby's declaration in favour of combined religious and secular instruction. He had, therefore, always rejoiced at the advancement of the system under difficulties almost unparalleled; and he now protested against the recent departure from that sound principle. No concession to any party ought to be permitted. The rules of the system should be common to all, and indiscriminating in their application. In the answer of the Government to-night there should be no mystification about the rules, but there should be laid down some broad and general principle upon which there could be no misunderstanding, and for the maintenance of which the Commissioners hereafter should be held responsible. As it was not likely that the Irish people would ever agree where a question of religious opinion was discussed, he would avoid all controversy which was more likely to excite the passions than promote reconciliation. No clergyman of any church should be permitted to undertake religious instruction, excepting at certain specified school hours, and then only to children of his own persuasion, as no parent could be expected to approve of the teaching of any minister not of his own faith. He was not about to express an opinion whether the educational grants, although differing in their form, but still proceeding from the State, should ever have been granted to these institutions. He objected to any extension of the exception. It was sheer nonsense to suppose that the convent schools could be made instrumental for the purposes of united education. The late rule promulgated by the Board must bear with it these characteristics. It must weaken the authority of the model schools, whilst it encouraged the hostile attitude of the other schools, which would assume the character of training establishments. The State had expended large sums of money for the establishment of these model schools, but in doing so it had acted wisely and well; and although the course of education pursued therein might not be altogether free from criticism, and although it might be impossible to say that the children were of an exclusively unmixed class, they were valuable as training establishments to those who were hereafter to be intrusted with the development of the system. He could confirm what had been stated by his hon. and learned Friend that a growing dissatisfaction had arisen in Ireland with regard to the Board of Education. In the place of the present Board he would gladly see appointed three salaried Commissioners representing different denominations—the Episcopalian, the Presbyterian, and the Roman Catholic; and to these he would add a fourth, the Chief Secretary of Ireland for the time being, who in Parliament should be held responsible for their acts. He would rather that these duties should be of an executive and administrative than of an original character. Let Parliament lay down a system of administration impartial in its rules, and giving common justice to all without favouring any political creed. If such a change were made, and the system were hereafter to be honestly and efficiently worked out, it would render education in Ireland abundantly productive of the greatest blessings to all classes of the community.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Rules sanctioned by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland on the 21st day of November, 1863, are, so far as regards their operation on the aid afforded to Convent and Monastic Schools, at variance with the principles of the system of National Education."—(Sir Hugh Cairns.)

MR. O'HAGAN (ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, he would not shrink from the responsibility of replying to the very able speech of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns), because he thought it was quite fit and becoming in one who had been assailed, not so much in that speech as in the agitation of which it was a very mild expression, that he should say, on behalf of himself and others, what he conceived ought to be satisfactory to any reasonable man in relation to charges which he knew, so far as imputations of motives were concerned, to be utterly unfounded, and which he believed to be, in relation to fact, equally unfounded. He had for some months past been observing the demonstrations—to use a word which was familiar to them in Ireland—which had been made in the press and on the platforms of certain districts of that country; and, beyond a doubt, the accusations which had been made against the Board of Education had been of a very grievous character. There had been accusations made against men of whom, although he was one of them, he presumed to say they were persons of the highest station in Ireland, and who had devoted their time and their thoughts—their anxious thoughts, in the face of much unfounded aspersion and much unmerited obloquy, to the advancement of the social and moral improvement of their country. He was very happy to have this question ventilated in the free air of the House of Commons, because he thought the opportunity was there afforded him of justifying those men, and, above all, of justifying one who was unjustly attacked, and whom, being a friend of his, he could with all sincerity describe as a man of the largest accomplishments and of the noblest nature; a man who having early achieved intellectual triumphs in a University in England, such as were unexampled in that University, had devoted his life in an office far below his mental and social attainments for advantages which, in a worldly point of view, were very contemptible indeed; but with this reward for him—that he had been able to confer benefits on the poor people of Ireland which would make his name an honoured one when the heats of party were over, and slander was at an end. He was happy to speak in that House on behalf of Mr. M'Donnell; and he thought that before he had concluded it would be patent to the House and to the world that the accusations which had been—in terms, gently, but in effect, strongly—urged by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast against him and his Colleagues, that they had been false to their trust—for it was no less than that—and that they had altered fundamental rules of the system without the sanction of the representative of the Sovereign, were accusations without a shadow of foundation. He could clearly understand this Motion if those at whose instance it was brought forward plainly avowed that their object was the one suggested by the hon. Gentleman, who had just addressed the House, at the close of his speech. He could well understand the movement if it was avowed that the object was not to bring before the public miserable charges which he should demonstrate to be unfounded, or to discuss a thing which was wretched and contemptible, whether they regarded its influence on society in Ireland, or as a pecuniary burden on the State; but to destroy a great institution, and substitute for a representative Board which commanded, in a great degree, the confidence of many and various parties in Ireland, a Board of three paid Commissioners—a Protestant, a Presbyterian, and a Roman Catholic.

Mr. O'Hagan

This was the object of the agitation and the attack, and the object of the clever speech which they had heard to-night. That he believed. But what was the charge which he had to meet? Not embarrassing himself, in the first place, with the number of criticisms which his hon. and learned Friend had so ably made on certain documents, he should meet the broad charge against the Board—namely, that it had introduced an innovation; that it had connected the convent schools with itself, and dealt with them in a mode different from that in which they had been dealt with before. That charge was put forward in this way—that a fundamental change had been accomplished in the rules of the Board, and that the change so made had not the sanction of the Government. Now, he asserted that no change had been made which in any way conflicted with the duty of the Board, or interfered with the established principles of the system. He asked the House to consider this question very deliberately, not with reference to the position of individuals, but with reference to the safety of the system which he and many in Ireland believed to be connected with the best interests of that country. He believed that, although the system might have errors which ought to be corrected, and imperfections which it might be well to remedy, it had advanced the morals and intelligence of the people of Ireland, which was one of the most moral and the least criminal countries on the face of the earth. He asked the House to remember this great fact, that though the hostility to the National Board had been multifarious and long-continued, though it had to contend with much of party spirit, it had so commended itself to the confidence of the people of Ireland, that the number of schools had increased from 789 in 1833 to 6,010 in 1862, and that in 1863 the number had still further increased to 6,163. The total number of children attending the schools, which in 1862 was 812,527, notwithstanding the depression which existed in Ireland, and the enormous emigration which had borne such vast numbers from the shores of that country had increased in 1863 to 840,569. With such facts before it, the House should be cautious before it came to a decision which might be most detrimental to the future interests of this great institution. Now what had been the relation between the conventual schools of Ireland and the National Board from its first establishment by Lord Derby? Soon after the famous letter by which the Board was founded, the question arose whether these schools should be connected with the Board. In point of fact, they had existed before the Board itself existed, they had been useful to Ireland, and had educated the people at a time when the State gave no aid for the purposes of education; and even the Kildare Place Society had helped these convent schools, giving them books and school requisites, though the managers of the society could not be accused of peculiar leaning towards the Irish Catholics. The matter was brought formally before Lord Stanley and the Irish Government, it was discussed by them, and in the first or second Report of the Board, answering the pamphlet of the Bishop of Exeter who had assailed them, the Board said that upon this point they had communicated with Lord Stanley, who thought it desirable that those schools should be brought under their superintendence, and that they should grant aid to them, which they accordingly had done. That was the Report of 1836. In 1837 there was a Commission of Inquiry of this House, and Mr. Carlile, a very able man, and a minister of the Church of Scotland, who was at the time resident commissioner, in reply to Lord Stanley, said the Board had received applications from some schools connected with nunneries and monasteries, that they had felt a difficulty in knowing how they were to proceed, and what the Government wished on the subject, but that, after communicating with Lord Stanley, they had unanimously resolved that it was desirable to include these schools. The House would see whether the effect of the Motion before the House would be exactly in harmony with this unanimous decision of Lord Stanley's Commissioners. In the same Report it appeared from the evidence of Dr. Kelly, now Judge Kelly, that when the convent schools were allowed to be taken into connection with the Board, Protestant and Presbyterian clergymen were applicants for the adoption of this course. The Presbyterians in the North of Ireland had taken a strong part in the discussion of this subject, but urged that the aid given to these schools should be withdrawn or diminished on the ground that they were exclusive and sectarian, and that the public ought to have nothing to do with them under a system of united education;

but the effect of the amended rules in Ulster had been to make the Presbyterian schools there, to a large extent, as exclusive as the convent schools, and the Commissioners were quite right in 1839 in putting the two classes of schools very much on a par in point of exclusiveness. It was said that the connection of the convent schools was brought about in a concealed way; but in 1854, during the inquiry which took place before the House of Lords, this point was gone into particularly, and in a Report prepared by Earl Granville there was a specific reference to the convent schools, and specific suggestions or directions were given, which were communicated to the Board, and must have been known to the public. There was thus the fullest opportunity of inquiring thoroughly into the connection, and of ascertaining what the conditions were. The fact was that the convent schools were, from the very inception of this system, recognized as worthy of connection with it, and as institutions which might be aided for the public advantage, and quite consistently with the principles of the Board. There had been a vast deal of talk about united education by a number of very energetic agitators here and there, and it was asserted that only those schools should be aided where there were children of various religious persuasions. But this never had been the principle of the Board. Its principle had been to establish certain rules under which every school seeking aid should come, that those rules should be of such a character as to prevent the possibility of proselytism, and that there should be a complete protection for a religious minority against a religious majority. That was the principle of the Board, and the principle of Lord Stanley's letter was, that there should be good secular instruction without interference with peculiar religious tenets. Qui hæret in literâ hæret in cortice. It would be an abuse of the principle which that letter contained, if it were contended that no school should receive aid from the State unless it had a mixture of scholars. The value of the Board was shown in the representative character which was now assailed—that it had adapted itself to the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, that it had not acted in a doctrinaire spirit, but that respecting the great principle of religious freedom, it had not sought to tamper with the purity of religious faith, and therefore it had afforded aid to every school which could honestly accept aid upon the terms indicated in the constitution of the Board. Besides adapting itself to the circumstances of the country, it had respected the opinion of the people, and consequently it had been able to confer, as he believed, great benefit upon the country. Then what was the state of the case with regard to the principle as indicated by the Board itself, and as bearing upon the question before the House? In an able Report of the Commissioners of 1844, it was stated that the principle had been from the beginning that the National schools should be open alike to Christians of all denominations, and that accordingly no child should be required to receive religious instruction to which its parents or guardians might object. Under these circumstances, the convent schools came into connection with the Board. It would surely have been wrong if the Board had refused to admit those schools. Having been admitted into connection with the Board, it was not necessary for him to dwell upon the efficiency of those schools; but, as the question had been mooted, he would just refer to one or two authorities upon that point, to prove that they had been of great benefit to Ireland, and had more than repaid the amount of assistance which had been extended to them. Dr. Henry gave it as his opinion that it was most important to retain the conventual schools under the Board, as they had more than 40,000 children under their charge, and he believed that the education imparted was of a very excellent character. Mr. Keenan, the present chief Inspector, spoke highly of conventual schools as giving a valuable elementary education, and Dr. Sullivan bore testimony to the value of those schools in training teachers. It was quite true that Mr. Sheridan had reported against those schools, but that gentleman's opinion was set against the authorities he had mentioned, and the Board could not be required to act upon the opinion of a single Inspector, however able, whose experience only related to a particular district. Then came the question whether these schools in respect of payment were such as they ought to be. They had been originally paid precisely as all other schools under the Board by a capitation grant. For the first ten years they received 10 per cent upon all children enrolled, and afterwards 15, and then 20 per cent upon all children in attendance. In 1839 the system of classification was established; the nuns could not, from the nature of the case, take the burden of that system, and the result was that at this moment these conventual schools, which were teaching more children than the Church Establishment of Ireland, and teaching them most efficiently, received something like one-fourth of the first-class teachers and one-third of the ordinary class. They did the work of the State most effectively, and they received about 7s. 2½d. per head, including monitors, while common schools got something like 14s. 4d. The convent schools, therefore, were doing work for which they were not paid. What did the whole of this agitation amount to? £2,000 was sought for a new class of monitors, to be divided between the convents and convent schools. The rule did not recognize the convents, but to large and very efficient schools certain advantage was to be afforded. Upon that was based the whole of this agitation. The pretence was not the reality. It was to destroy the convent schools, or separate them altogether from the Board. Such being the historical relation subsisting between the Board under the authority of Lord Derby, under the able men who had been Commissioners, and under the sanction of Parliament, he now came to consider whether there had been a violation of any fundamental rule in providing that in certain large and efficient schools a third class of monitors should be provided. For a course of years—more than twenty—the monitorial system had been established by the Board; it had been altered from time to time; it had been increased in efficiency by the Board; and when the Board, having large experience, very slightly modified that system, by a mere administrative act, for a mere administrative purpose, it would be very hard for the House to come to the conclusion that there was a change in fundamental principle which required the assent of the Lord Lieutenant before the Board should be allowed to act upon it. He read extracts from the Reports of 1843 and 1844, which showed that the Board had established the system of monitors, paying them from £4 to £7 a year. In the latter year they had fifteen boys and fifteen young women in training for that purpose, and they hoped gradually to bring forward a body of masters and mistresses thoroughly qualified to undertake the management of the schools. They did not ask the assent of the Lord Lieutenant to that. It was regarded as a mere administrative act. It appeared quite clear that no fundamental principle was involved in the arrangements which had been made by the Board with regard to the monitors from 1843 to 1860, and, indeed, nobody had suggested that such was the case. That being so, was the Board, he would ask, to be condemned as having betrayed its trust because it had not appealed to the Government to confirm the particular alteration in question? In 1855 a second class of junior monitors was appointed, who were to receive a smaller sum ranging from £2 to £4 a year, and the Commissioners in that year said that "in the case of schools commanding a larger attendance and distinguished by their superior efficiency, it should be allowable to appoint two or more monitors." It would at once, therefore, be seen, that if a covert design lurked under words almost identical in 1864, that same design must have been present to the minds of the men by whom the Report of 1855 was drawn up. Yet in 1855 no one presumed to say that a fundamental change was made in the rules, or that the Lord Lieutenant should have been consulted in the matter. It was stated on the other side that in 1862 the Commissioners, acting without any legal authority, instituted certain monitors in a certain school in Dublin; but the transaction was a very simple one, and one which had been recognized by every set of Commissioners from the first. It became a serious question with the people in Ireland, who took an interest in educational matters, whether or not it was desirable to continue the monitors after a certain time in connection with the Board for a short period. There were, it should be borne in mind, two classes of monitors—the seniors and the juniors. The senior class continued in connection with the Board until about the age of eighteen, at which age a monitor became eligible to receive a teachership. It was, however, found that though eligible he or she was rarely elected, because there was a feeling that it was better that persons of maturer age should be appointed. The result was that when boys or girls arrived at the age of eighteen, and found they could not get a teachership, they left the school, and in many cases emigrated; so that though educated for the public benefit, and at the public expense, they were lost to the public service. It occurred, therefore, to rational people in Ireland, that it would be a matter of great importance that these children should be continued in connection with the Board until the period at which they might receive teacherships, and it was considered that by keeping them for a period of two years, that desirable object might be accomplished. And what, he would ask, had been the practice of the Board since its institution? It did not frame rules until it had some means of ascertaining whether they were workable and wise by experiment, and acting upon that principle they came to the conclusion to add to the two classes of monitors which he had already mentioned a third class, which might continue to operate in the schools. Such, then, was their appalling interference with the settled institutions of the country, and the fundamental principles of their constitution. Two or three collateral matters had been mixed up with that question, certainly not for the purpose of making it clearer and more comprehensible. It was not the fact that convent schools were the only schools with which the Board would deal under that rule. The rule extended to every large and efficient school in the country, whether Protestant, Presbyterian, or Catholic. [Cries of "Name!"] He believed there was such a school in the town of Belfast. [Sir HUGH CAIRNS: "I expressly said that no school could be named but that."] The rule had not yet been acted upon, but he was informed, on the authority of as trustworthy men as ever breathed, that there were some fifty, or perhaps sixty, schools in Ireland which would be perfectly capable, from their size and efficiency, of availing themselves of the operation of the rule. That was an answer which ought to satisfy any reasonable mind. As to the model schools, the allegation of the hon. and learned Member was that they should be and were the training schools of Ireland. Now he would assert the contrary of that. The model schools grew up in this way. When the Board was originally constituted it did not appear to have occurred to anybody that more than one model school would be necessary; but very soon the Commissioners took a different view, and began to establish model schools in the various counties of Ireland. That was done, not in order to train teachers, but that, as the name implied, models should be set up, complete in all their parts, as examples to be followed in the rest of the schools throughout the country.

A model school, no doubt, trained teachers to a certain extent, but every school under the Board where there was a monitor also did the same in a degree; and it would be quite contrary to the principle of a model school to make it an institution for the training of teachers only. The hon. and learned Gentleman said the model schools were sufficient to supply all the teachers needed for Ireland; but the fact was they had 7,247 teachers in all in connection with the Board, and only 3,331 had been trained in those establishments. There were 700 teachers required every year, and the model schools did not supply one-half of that number. The authority of Mr. Newall had been cited in opposition to that calculation, but Mr. Newall must have been under a mistake, for in the year to which he referred there were actually 732 new teachers required. It might be confidently asserted that the model schools ought not to train all their teachers. It was a wise arrangement to have those schools retrenched. There were thirteen of them in Ulster; he did not know whether there was one in Connaught, and there were not many in Munster. It would be monstrous to think of sending young persons from one province to another to be trained as teachers, when they would be at a great distance from their parents and friends, and when an enormous expense would be incurred without securing any better results than were now obtained in a much more economical manner. He maintained, then, that the model schools neither were nor should be the training establishments for teachers in Ireland. Attention had been called last Session by his hon. Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. O'Reilly) to the question of the model schools, and that hon. Member certainly raised an argument with reference to some of those institutions which appeared not to admit of a very easy answer. The expenditure made upon them was regarded as excessive; and the Treasury, having had the circumstance brought to its notice, had done what he generally did—namely, performed its duty, and directed the Commissioners to look into the matter, with a view to curtail any useless outlay of public money. The Commissioners obeyed their instructions, and suggested a reduction of £2,500, which was agreed to by the Treasury. That proceeding had no possible connection, either in intention or in fact, with that other arrangement, the creation of a third class of monitors. No doubt in the Belfast school a considerable reduction had been made; but in that school it turned out that there was a teacher for every twelve pupils. In the Enniscorthy school it also turned out that there was a teacher for every eight pupils. He had endeavoured to present broadly to the House the history of the connection of the convent schools and the monitorial system with the National Board, and he said, again, that whether the object of this Motion was to effect a small arrangement, or whether it was really designed to effect the connection of convents with the National Board, the case had entirely failed. If the objection were confined to the arrangement, he answered that it was according to the settled practice of the Board, and was justified by the necessity of the case. If he was told that the desire was to sever the connection of the convents with the Board, as had been suggested elsewhere, and as would seem to be the legitimate corollary from the argument which they had heard that evening—even though it might not be intended—then he invoked the authority of Lord Derby, the founder of the system, and referred to the unbroken course of action of the Commission, to the admirable results which that course had produced, and to the danger and destruction which its abandonment would undoubtedly involve. The people of Ireland had a great regard and a deep love for their conventual institutions. They were attracted to education by those institutions as nothing else could attract them. Would it not be a pity and a shame to deprive them of those advantages which they had heretofore enjoyed at so trifling a cost to the State? It was not desirable that they should in dealing with Ireland act always with the rigidity of logic or in the narrow spirit of doctrinaires. It was necessary to look to the feelings of the people, to the position of the people, and to the traditions of the people in order to govern Ireland rightly. The people were impulsive, they were impressible, they were ardent. Sometimes they exhibited an excess of love and hate; but those very circumstances, their peculiar history, and the position in which they stood, entitled them to and required for them special generosity and special kindness. They might be sure that if they gave them kindness it would be answered by trust; and if they gave them kindness they would return more than gratitude. That had been too often forgotten, but it ought especially to be borne in mind with reference to this question. The schools to which the people were most deeply attached were the convent schools. They were to them a sacred thing. If the connection which had been wisely established and well maintained between those schools and the National Board was severed, the people of Ireland would be led to repel and repudiate the principles of that body. It was not desirable to produce such a result. It was desirable to inspire the people with confidence and with trust. There was in operation in the country a great influence—an incalculable power which would exist whether hon. Members desired it or not, and it would be infinitely better to accept that influence, to cultivate kindly and friendly relations with it, and to utilize it as far as possible. Dean Kernan, of Dundalk, in his evidence before the Lords' Committee of 1854, stated that the connection between the convent schools and the National Board had done a great deal to remove the suspicions with which the people, the clergy, and the bishops of Ireland at first received the National system, and that if that connection was broken their confidence in it would be gone. These were grave and weighty words. The Motion before the House would very much endanger the connection to which this distinguished dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church attached so much importance, and therefore he hoped that the House would not agree to it.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland having anticipated that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) would make an attack upon the National Board, had prepared a speech, the greater part of which was not ad litteram, and had with scrupulous care avoided the three important points which were alleged by his hon. and learned Friend. This, which the Attorney General treated as a trifling and contemptible matter, had excited the opposition of all the respectability of the North of Ireland, and even some of the right hon. Gentleman's colleagues had protested against this act of arbitrary power, which was justified or attempted to be palliated by him as a mere act of administrative authority. But what was the opinion of the organ of the Government? The Chief Secretary for Ireland, writing from Dublin

Castle to the resident Commissioner, said that the attention of the Irish Government had been drawn to "certain contemplated changes in the fundamental rules of the system of National Education in Ireland, the effect of which will be seriously to imperil the principle upon which that system is based," and reminded him, as resident Commissioner, "that the Board of Commissioners, as incorporated by Royal Charter, has no power to change any fundamental rule without the express permission of the Lord Lieutenant." These were the expressions of the Chief Secretary; and then the Attorney General, who ought to be his right hand, to sustain him in his exposition of the law, stood up and said that there was not a word of truth in that letter, that no fundamental rule was altered or amended, and that the changes had no foundation except in the imagination of the right hon. Baronet. He believed that both as to law and fact the right hon. Baronet had stated exactly that which it was his duty to state. It was a very pretty quarrel as it stood, and there he was quite ready to leave it. What could be the value of a Government the leading members of which differed point blank from each other? The National system was founded in succession to the Kildare Place Society, a tolerant institution, established by the Church to which he had the honour to belong, and it was a significant fact that those who now advocated an exceptional policy for the Roman Catholics and the Presbyterians persistently refused the smallest concession to the Established Church. It was quite true that the Kildare Place Society gave their good books to the Roman Catholic convents, but on one condition, that they would read and understand them. One of the books so given was the New Testament. The Kildare Place Society insisted that it should be read, and on that point, after some time, a split took place, and the National Board was established. For several years the new system worked very well. It was supported by Archbishop Whately, the foremost man in Ireland; but at length Archbishop Murray died, and then the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland received a new head from Rome. That personage immediately took the government of the business into his own hands. He at once objected to the books which had been assented to by the right rev. Dr. Murray, and when Archbishop Whately said that he had induced his clergy to join the National Board on the faith that those books would be used, Dr. Cullen replied that he had nothing to do with engagements entered into before his arrival in Ireland. The result was that the Commissioners, like obedient men, kicked the books out, and when Archbishop Whately asked to reason it with them they flatly refused, for it was a remarkable peculiarity of the National Board that it never reasoned. Archbishop Whately, who was a logician, charged them with having departed from the principle on which the National system was founded, but they declined to give any reply, and contented themselves with obeying the behest of Dr. Cullen. Finally, the Archbishop told them they had been guilty of a breach of faith to the public, and withdrew from the Board. No doubt they were glad to get rid of him, for the presence of an eminent, honest, thinking man must have been a great obstruction to their proceedings. Shortly afterwards the Synod of Thurles published its decrees, all of which were aimed directly at the National System of Education, as originally established, and ever since the Board had acted in exact accordance with the commands of the Synod. Lord Derby intended that there should be a combined literary and a separate religious education. The Synod of Thurles decreed that an end should be put to that principle, and Dr. Cullen openly and honestly advised his clergy to take advantage of the National system in order to defeat the plan of its founders. All the Roman Catholic children were withdrawn from the model schools, one of the objects of which was, notwithstanding what the Attorney General had said, to train young persons as teachers. It appeared from the Reports of the Inspectors—a body of gentlemen, many of them Roman Catholics, for whom he had the highest respect—that the plan adopted was, first to establish a convent school in the neighbourhood of a model school, and then to induce Roman Catholic parents to transfer their children from the latter to the former. In some cases, not merely were the pupils withdrawn, but the paid monistresses were directed to resign. Thus the schools established to carry out the original principle of the Earl of Derby were gradually brought to the brink of ruin, and now the question arose, where the masters and mistresses were to come from who were to continue what was still preposterously called the National System of Education in Ireland. Upon these convent schools he made no attack whatever. They were conducted by highly respectable ladies, deserving much praise for their zeal and devotion. But he could not stand up and conscientiously say with the Attorney General for Ireland, that he believed conventual and monastic bodies to be best fitted to undertake the education of mankind. He believed the account to be strictly correct which was given of them in that Report of the Roman Catholic Inspector, which was shamefully concealed from Parliament, and even from some of the Commissioners of National Education, till one of them found it out, and led to its being moved for in that House. In that Report they were shown to be founded on virtuous intolerance. The Attorney General for Ireland had said that complaints had been made about nothing at all. But it was impossible to read those able protests without seeing that they were levelled against the system of giving money for the spread of the religious principle, the very reverse of that animating the National system, against diverting the funds intended for the secular education of the country to the training of masters and mistresses in religious establishments, so as to indoctrinate the country with their peculiar principles. Into the Emancipation Act clauses were introduced forbidding the establishment of monastic institutions in Ireland, but to the very establishments proscribed by the law the State was now paying money for the education of youths. A clergyman of the Established Church could not get so much as a book from this National Board, which the country was taxed to support. Books, money, influence were all handed to monks and nuns, friars and Jesuits, to carry out their views. And this was called even-handed justice. What has been the result of this action of the Board? The Lady Superiress of Baggot Street Convent modestly demanded that no less than forty monistresses should be sent in one consignment to that institution, that large number being requisite, it was stated, to satisfy the wishes and feelings of the general population of Ireland. The reasons on which the demand was based were ably set out in the despatch, for attached to each of those convents, he believed, there was always a highly educated and distinguished member of some confraternity: the document closed with a reference to the recognition attributed to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies of the importance of separate denominational training establishments. The object of the application was to supply the places of the teachers who before were taught in the training establishments and in the model schools with others trained upon their conventual system. [Mr. O'HAGAN: Read the answer of the Commissioners.] The answer was dated 1864, and he need not remind the right hon. Gentleman that there was such a thing as the House of Commons. Only for it he knew not what would become of them in Ireland. The answer stated that it was entirely out of the power of the Commissioners to comply with the request made to them. But if that were so, it must have been equally out of their power to give paid monitresses, which was the same thing under another name. They knew there was to be a full discussion in the House of Commons. [Laughter.] A laugh, he might remind the hon. Gentleman, was no argument, and he should be glad if he would debate the matter in sounds less audible but more sensible. The spirit underlying all these movements might be gathered from the letters of Mr. Kavanagh, a zealous Roman Catholic, formerly holding high office under the National Board. In one letter addressed to the Earl of Carlisle, he boasted of what the Catholic strength of the country had already achieved, adding—

"We have our heel on the neck of the National system, the vitals of which are well-nigh strangled."

Formerly, the matter in dispute between Protestants and Roman Catholics was as to the reading of the Scriptures. That stage had long since passed, and a reference to the reading of the Scriptures was scarcely ever heard in the present day. There were 3,000 schools, of which 3,000 priests were patrons, and as to what became of the Scriptures in those schools it was not necessary to inquire. He wished to speak with all respect of the National Commissioners. They were, however, a Board; and a Board was a thing without heart, without feelings, without substance or affections—in short, it was a Board. He asked the House, which had visited with its indignation practices in the Educational Department in England not one-hundredth part as much to be complained of as those in Ireland, to express its opinion fearlessly on the conduct of that Board, and in particular to remember its suppression of a most valuable Report. That document reflected the highest credit on the abilities, candour, and honesty of the gentleman who framed it. His division of the subjects treated of was most skilful, and in it he showed conclusively that the alleged success of the National system in secular education was purely a myth. Mr. Sheridan in that Report said, that should his conclusion be verified it behoved the Commissioners to take some steps to effect a radical change in the course of the secular instruction. Having that Report before them, it was the duty of the Government to act upon the information which it contained. He regretted that the principle on which the Commissioners enforced, endowed, and enriched these schools, for the purpose of overthrowing the model and training schools, was that of carrying out Ultramontane views. No doubt the Secretary for Ireland would follow him in debate, would vindicate his letter, and with his usual frankness would state why he differed from the Attorney General on this subject. But the present discussion gave him and those around him no redress. The system of united education was a myth. He would admit that some Protestant children went to the Roman Catholic schools, and that the humbler classes of Irish children went to the convent schools because they were religious institutions. But the principle of the Board was that the schools should be opened to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects alike. Would any one say that these convent schools were intended for Protestant children? He believed that they were intended to separate the Roman Catholics from the Protestants, in order to educate the former as the priest wished. He had been assured by a Roman Catholic that every book in these schools, even those on secular subjects, was to be permeated with the spirit of the Catholic religion. This was a big and mighty question. It might be asked what part the Established Church in Ireland would take in it. He did not ask for one guinea for the Church Education Society, but he wished the reins to be held tightly over the secular system of education in Ireland, so that it might not be perverted or spoiled. He thought that secular system good. He was willing to take the books, the training, and the inspection of that system, but the Church would never give up the right to use the Scriptures in the schools. The great principle of Church education was just as strong as ever, and the society had 1,800 schools open, and about 40,000 scholars. Yet the Board would not give any books to the schools of the Church Education Society, while they gave them to the nuns, who were far more exclusive. The question now arose what was to be done with the Board? There could be no doubt it must be knocked down. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) constituted a Board of twenty in number, and every one rightly prophesied that they would meet to debate, and not to administer, the affairs intrusted to them. The first thing would be to get rid of the Board. It would be for the House of Commons to say whether there should be paid Commissioners in its place. He would ask the House whether it was possible, in the present condition of this question, to coerce the consciences of any class of persons? He asked them to consider whether it was not possible to extend to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects the blessings of a good sound secular education in addition to that religious education which Protestants had always contended for, and which they would not be true Protestants if they did not contend for still? He would entreat the House, in justice to the Roman Catholic as well as the Protestant population of Ireland, to affirm the Resolution so logically advocated by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast.

MR. MAGUIRE moved that the debate be adjourned.

FORFEITURE OF LANDS AND GOODS BILL.—[BILL 21].—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHARLES FORSTER said, that he regretted the subject of forfeiture on conviction of crime had not been dealt with at the time of the passing of the Criminal Acts Amendment Bill. The law of forfeiture was unjust in principle, inconvenient in practice, and was unworthy of modern civilization. It had its origin in remote times. It was the worst feature of the prosecutions of Sylla and Marius in Rome, and in the feudal times the rich adopted it as a means of robbing the poor. The law on the subject now in force in the country was substantially that which was defined by the Statute of Edward II. That statute conferred upon the Sovereign the goods of all persons convicted of felony. He did not apprehend there would be any difficulty if the Bill became law in the matter of compensation to certain corporations who had claims to the goods of convicted felons. There was one class of cases which he did not propose to include in the Bill—namely, attainders. He did not think it right to punish the innocent for the guilty; yet, as the law of treason was of very rare occurrence, he proposed to confine his measure to ordinary cases of felony. At present the law made an anomalous distinction between felonies and misdemeanours. The smallest larceny was a felony, and conviction was followed by forfeiture. On the other hand, forfeiture was not a consequence of misdemeanour, though misdemeanour comprehended offences of a more injurious nature than the large majority of cases of felony that came before the Courts. In the mineral districts a man was sometimes sentenced to a day's imprisonment for stealing a lump of coal, and was told that all his goods and chattels were forfeited to the Crown. On the other hand, the bankers who a few years ago were tried at the Central Criminal Court for one of the greatest frauds that could be committed against society, and who were sentenced to lengthened terms of imprisonment, did not as misdemeanants incur any forfeiture whatever. The principle for which he contended was, that the punishment inflicted by the Court ought to be adequate to the offence, without superadding a punishment that fell upon the innocent. It might be said that the Crown was always ready on a proper representation of the facts to remit the penalty of forfeiture. Why, however, should they retain on the statute-book a law which was a blot upon the jurisprudence of the country? The operation of the law was shown in the case of an artist named Kirwan, who was tried and convicted in 1862 for the murder of his wife in Ireland's Eye. The capital punishment was in his case commuted, but all the convict's furniture and effects were sold by auction and the proceeds paid into the Treasury, to the exclusion of those who had the strongest claims upon the property. The Returns showed that a partial remission by the Crown of its rights was usually conceded, but this remission proceeded on no well-defined principle. A convict in Middlesex with £400 a year incurred the forfeiture of his property. His daughter applied to the Treasury, but she could only get £200 a year. The amounts that found their way to the Treasury from this source were very inconsiderable. The Crown usually exercised its rights, and left the convict's friends to make representations, in consequence of which the property, or a portion of it, was sometimes given back. If that were the operation of the law in the case of the guilty, the House would see how vast an amount of oppression was exercised in the case of the innocent. Under the existing law, they could only protect themselves by conveying their property to some third party before trial. Not long ago a gentleman of position in Staffordshire became the subject of a prosecution for stealing timber. He was acquitted, but he had to go through the process of conveying all his property to others. There were not wanting, however, cases in which the parties to whom property had been thus conveyed had asserted their absolute right to it after a verdict of "Not Guilty." Another class of cases were those of coroners' verdicts. A coroner's jury in Staffordshire returned a verdict of "Manslaughter" against an opulent and highly respectable ironmaster in consequence of an accident. The verdict was quashed, or that gentleman might have been subjected to the humiliating process of conveying all his property to somebody else. The ironmaster actually retired from business rather than have the law of forfeiture hanging over his head. Take another case, brought before the House recently by his hon. Friend the Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley). Mr. Bewicke had been convicted of felony. Every article of his furniture had been sold, and he had no resource but to accept the miserable sum offered to him. A Committee was sitting to inquire into his case, and, whatever the result of their deliberations might be, the case itself would be remembered as a lasting monument of suffering innocence and grievous oppression. The cause of humanity and justice was deeply indebted to the exertions of his hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries, who had been mainly instrumental in divesting our Criminal Code of much of its former Draconian character. Considering the many just and humane modifications which had been of late years made in our Criminal Law, he could not but entertain the most sanguine anticipations that the British Parliament would not refuse to abolish the last law of a barbarous age, and to place our criminal jurisprudence upon a footing more consonant and in harmony with that humane and enlightened legislation which had of recent years characterized its proceedings. He moved that the Bill be read a second time.

MR. W. EWART seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
—(Mr. Charles Forster.)

MR. HUNT said, that the Bill had the merit of being a short one, the enacting part of it consisting of three lines and a word. It was a measure intended to abrogate a law which had existed for a great many centuries. Now, before he consented to abolish anything that had the sanction of antiquity he should certainly require the most excellent and substantial reasons. He was generally inclined to believe that a law which had existed for a great many hundred years, had good reasons to sustain it. The hon. Gentleman said that the law had its origin in the worst times of the Roman empire, and that it had found its way into this country upon the introduction of the feudal system. Now Blackstone was at issue with the hon. Gentleman as to the pedigree of this law. It did not owe its origin to the feudal system. [Mr. CHARLES FORSTER explained.] He would beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon, but he would take leave to refer him to the second volume of Blackstone (Chitty's edition), who stated that the forfeiture of lands and the other property of a criminal was a doctrine of the old Saxon law, and that it did not belong to the feudal system. This, then, was a vestige of the old Saxon law. It appeared that it did not escape the attention of those who took part in the framing of Magna Charta, for it had a provision in favour of those who were unjustly convicted, and the law so modified by Magna Charta remained unchanged up to the present time. Now the law was not without its advantages as regarded the interests of society generally. The law of forfeiture placed the rich man on a par with the poor as regarded the administration of justice. The rich man had an enormous advantage over the poor in escaping justice. There was a tradition—he did not know whether it was true or not—that some time back a rich man tried for murder escaped by promising the Judge the possession of his lands at his death. Whether the bargain was made or not it was certain that he escaped; it was agreed that the murder was committed, and the Judge's family eventually inherited the rich man's lands. Cases had recently occurred in which rich offenders had been enabled to elude justice by bribing witnesses essential to their conviction to keep out of the way. Ought there not, then, to be some countervailing disadvantage? Was not the prospect of losing lands and goods to a large amount a strong inducement to wealthy persons to abstain from committing crime? He admitted there was an anomalous distinction between felonies and misdemeanours, many of which were graver offences than trivial felonies. The hon. Member for Walsall proposed to remove the anomaly by relieving the felon, but he should rather be disposed to go in the other direction and make the misdemeanant in certain cases forfeit his land and goods as well as the felon. Take the case of those who accumulated stolen property. The premises of such persons were sometimes found full of goods which they had acquired by dishonest practices, and it was only right that the law should lay hold of property acquired in that way. The hon. Gentleman said the law was evaded by the property being conveyed before trial to other parties; but he imagined that in cases of conviction the conveyance was invalid, and that the forfeiture related back to the commission of the offence. Then, again, they were told that the innocent wife and children suffered from the cruelty of the law. But they must remember that one inducement to a man to observe the law was the consideration that if he broke it, not only himself but his family would be involved in the evil consequences; and that consideration was also an inducement to the man's family to keep him within the law. The case of Mr. Bewicke, referred to by the hon. Gentleman, was still under consideration; but he, as a Member of the Select Committee, would only say to the hon. Member, that if he knew as much of the facts as the Committee he would not have used the strong expressions which had just fallen from him. He was far from saying that the law was perfect. There were many points upon which the law might be altered in the sense which the hon. Gentleman wished; but, on the other hand, he (Mr. Hunt) would like to see the law made applicable to many classes of misdemeanour. If the hon. Member had proposed a Select Committee to consider what alteration of the law was necessary, he would have voted with him; but the Bill as it stood was a crude piece of legislation, incapable of being put into a satisfactory shape, and he therefore moved that it be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Hunt.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that if in voting for the second reading they were called upon at once to commit themselves to the full length to which the preamble of the Bill, literally interpreted, would carry them, he should be unable to bind himself to that extent. He understood, however, that his hon. Friend was only desirous of having the principle affirmed, that the present law of forfeiture of lands and goods was one which ought not to be maintained, and required mitigation; not that it was absolutely necessary in all cases to abolish the forfeiture of land and goods, but that the present law was not suited to the times, and required at least a large alteration. In that sense he would prefer that the House should assent to the second reading of the Bill, on the understanding, however, that hon. Members did not pledge themselves to the manner in which the desired mitigation was to be carried into effect. If it was thought more desirable (as indeed he thought it was) that the matter should be taken up by the Government, who could collect from all their sources of information materials upon which to found a complete judgment, then he was prepared to promise that the subject should receive attention before the next meeting of Parliament. He would admit that if they had to choose between maintaining the present law of forfeiture and its total abolition, the latter would be, on the whole, preferable; but there was a course that was better than either. The very classification of crimes as felonies was singularly imperfect. As had been stated by his hon. Friend, there were many grave misdemeanours which were infinitely worse than slight felonies. Here, then, they came across an anomaly involving a practical injustice. On the other hand, the effect of the measure now before the House was such that, if it passed in its present form, a man convicted of a capital felony would escape the forfeiture of his property. The law at present showed so much tenderness for human life, that the heaviest punishment not capital could not be thought too great for some offences, for which death was not inflicted. Of this class of cases were murders and attempts to murder, where the capital sentence was commuted, and other crimes of violence, with some cases of forgery and fraud. In these cases, civil death seemed to be a most reasonable consequence of crime; but, if the present Bill were adopted simply as it stood, an offender, convicted of any of these crimes, might, notwithstanding, remain in the possession and enjoyment of the whole of his property. Such a money power might be capable of being inconveniently used against the law, even for the purposes of escape. If a mitigation in cases such as these were thought desirable at all, the law should still take from the individual the title to property, leaving the succession to the innocent members of the family. That was practically the case now, for where the family seemed unde-servedly to suffer, and memorialized the Crown, all the circumstances were usually taken into account, and the benefit of the family was not lost sight of. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) had alluded to another class of offenders, which made it most important that the Crown should retain some hold over the property of felons. He meant those who had accumulated, by robbery or fraud, a quantity of other people's property. The present law enabled the Crown, without litigation, to make such restitution to those who had been despoiled as was desirable and possible. Without going further into details, he would merely mention one other subject involved in the Bill, which would require full consideration. One inconvenient relic of feudal times was what were called manorial rights. In many manors and royalties, amongst other rights of the Crown granted to individuals, were felons' goods. The Bill would abolish that right, and this might possibly be considered by some to involve a question of compensation. He expressed no opinion on that subject, he merely mentioned it as one which would require careful consideration. In assenting to the principle of the Bill, therefore, he did not pledge himself to details, and on that understanding he should support the Motion for the second reading.

MR. WHITESIDE said, when he was Attorney General for Ireland it became part of his duty to look into the subject, and he came to the conclusion to which Sir Samuel Romilly had come—that it was not possible for the wit of man to suggest an argument to justify the forfeiture of goods and lands. The matter was laid before his colleagues, and they were called before the Cabinet of which his right hon. Friend near him (Sir John Pakington) was a member to explain the proposal which they had agreed to recommend. The result was that a Bill was brought in which was afterwards withdrawn, and referred to the Committee which was then sitting on the subject of the Consolidation of the Criminal Law. That Committee was of opinion that they could not do more than consolidate the statute law of the two countries, and the subject, therefore, was not taken up by them. He was not quite sure that he had correctly followed the shadowy distinctions of the Attorney General, but he was willing to proceed upon this broad principle—that if they took away a man's life they ought to be satisfied, and not to inflict a punishment undeservedly upon his posterity. He never had a more painful duty to discharge than when, as Law Officer of the Crown, he had to decide what should be done with the property of a wretched man who had been executed. Upon his advice the property was given, as it ought to be both by the law of reason and humanity, to the family of the man who had committed no crime, and therefore ought not to be punished. He had had occasion to defend persons charged with high treason, and he knew what was done in such cases was that the property was conveyed away before the trial. There was a memorable instance of a person in Ireland, who, being accused of treason, took poison, and then, leaning over the dock, whispered to Curran, "We have deceived the Senate," and died. If the direct question were to go to a division, he should support it.

MR. HADFIELD said, he should support the Bill, on the ground that cruelty in the punishment of crime was a great mistake. In the reign of Henry VIII. the cook of the Bishop of Rochester poisoned two of his fellow-servants, and in order to show abhorrence for a crime which had been perpetrated in a Bishop's palace it was enacted that he should be boiled to death. The cook was literally boiled, but what became of him afterwards he could not say. But the second section of the Act said that the lands of the offenders against it should escheat to the lord of the fee. He should like to know whether the Act of Henry VIII. was repealed last year? What injustice would be done by depriving the lord of the fee of such rights as he possessed under that Act? Another offence, once common in Lancashire, was witchcraft. Witchcraft was a felony. A case was on record of ten or twelve witches being tried for murder by incantation, and several of them were executed, and their land was forfeited. The offence and the forfeiture were abolished, and the crime being no longer cognisable by law it had ceased. He trusted that Parliament would do away with the barbarous law of forfeiture. Was there a man more to be pitied than one who had fallen into crime? Were he poor or were he wealthy, his reputation was gone for ever. He could never show his face in society again. And where was his property? It was taken from his family; and if the man came back from his punishment, where was he to live and how was he to live; and what became of his family? The late Governor of the Wakefield House of Correction had given an opinion that cruelty in the punishment of crime had been a great mistake; and that it was not the excessive vindictiveness of the law that prevented the commission of crime, but moral instruction and teaching. The House and the country were indebted to the hon. Member for bringing in this Bill. The property gained by the Crown by forfeiture was infinitesimal; its loss was ruinous to innocent families; and the system was unbecoming the dignity of a great nation.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he had been struck by the curious language which had been used by almost every hon. Gentleman who had spoken on the subject. The hon. Gentleman who had brought in the Bill, and had supported his views with great candour and great power, spoke of the right principle upon which all punishment ought to be inflicted, and said that the present state of the law was unjust to the children. But he should like to know what punishment inflicted upon the father did not fall upon the children, and whether there was not high authority for visiting the children for the crimes of their parents? The hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment said he had a great love for anything that was ancient.

MR. HUNT explained that what he did say was, when a law had existed for centuries he always presumed there was good reason for it, and therefore he required good reasons for its abolition.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that the law against witches had existed for centuries, and therefore recommended itself to the hon. Gentleman. The Attorney General had spoken of the enormity of the offence. But what had the enormity of the offence to do with the punishment? Punishment ought to be inflicted only for two purposes—first for reformation and then for prevention. He thought it was Bentham who said that if a crime could be prevented by a fine of a penny, then any infliction of pain beyond what such a fine would cause was wrong. Now, it was supposed that the forfeiture of lands and goods was a means of preventing crime. But was that mode of prevention equivalent in the one scale to the pain and misery inflicted upon the family in the other? It was not a matter of sentiment, but of inquiry. The greater part of the crimes of society were committed by poor people. He did not state that for the purpose of showing that there was inherent vice in the poor, but simply as a matter of fact. The punishment in question had no existence for the poor, nor would any one believe that the rich were prevented from committing crimes by the fear of the loss of their property. In Scotland the penalty of forfeiture for the crime of treason was made void by an arrangement by which the succession should be in one person, but the actual enjoyment in another, and the father went on one side and the son on the other, so that, whatever turned up, the family always kept the estate. But it could not be said that England was less famous for its treasons than Scotland, and therefore the loss of property was no prevention of crime. He could come to the same conclusion as his hon. Friend (Mr. Charles Forster), though upon different grounds; and he maintained that all that was done by the present state of the law was unmitigated mischief, because it produced pain without any corresponding advantage. He quite agreed with the Attorney General that it was a grave matter, and ought to be dealt with by the Government. He was sure from the character of his hon. Friend he would be glad to see the matter in the hands of the Government, but the Government must not trifle with it. They must understand that the opinion of society demanded that an exceedingly mischievous provision should be struck out of the law, and that the time had arrived for doing so. If, therefore, his hon. Friend would take his advice, he would place the matter in the hands of the Attorney General.

MR. MARSH said, he should support the Bill. It was an ancient principle of English law laid down by Blackstone, that no man should be fined beyond his means, but in this case a man was not only fined beyond his means, but was deprived of the whole of his means.

MR. MALINS said, there seemed to be a general concurrence of opinion in the House in favour of the Bill, and he had no hesitation in giving it his support. He ventured to say that from the beginning of the world no one had been deterred from the commission of crime by the fear that he would lose his property and goods. Besides, the law as it stood was practically inoperative, as, because when an accusation was brought against a man, the first thing that was done was to make an assignment of his property to trustees for the benefit of his family. He knew himself of a case in which a man had in this way transferred property worth £30,000, and though he was afterwards acquitted the trustees refused to give up the property, and, as far as he knew, he was now destitute and entirely dependent on the bounty of his family for support. He approved the language of the Bill, which was simple and effectual for its purpose. If the measure was committed to the Attorney General, it would not pass this Session, and therefore he hoped the House would support the second reading of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he hoped they would not have a division, for, substantially, they were all agreed upon the subject, and if the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State would intimate that the matter would be taken up by the Government, the hon. Gentleman would do well to leave it in their hands. It was not desirable to pledge the House, as the Bill proposed to do, that it was expedient to abolish the forfeiture of lands and goods. All that ought to be done was to restrain the forfeiture. If forced to a division, he should be obliged to vote against the second reading, though he should be sorry not to meet the views of the hon. Member.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had not the slightest difficulty in giving the assurance required by the hon. Baronet, though he thought it unnecessary after what had been stated by the Attorney General. His hon. and learned Friend had agreed in the principle of the Bill, that the goods of persons convicted of felony should not in all cases be forfeited, though there were certain cases in which he thought further inquiry necessary, with a view to ascertain whether the principle of total abolition should not be modified. The Attorney General thought it necessary to get information with respect to the working of the law in foreign countries. In France he believed power was given to the Court in certain cases to impound the property either for the purposes of paying the expenses of the prosecution, or of giving compensation to persons who had suffered by the crime. His hon. and learned Friend had undertaken to look fully into the matter.

MR. PACKE said, the House was generally in favour of the Bill, but when he found that the alteration of the law was contained in three lines, he could not understand how the measure could be amended in Committee to suit the views of the Government. The wise course would be to withdraw the Bill, and leave the matter in the hands of the Government.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he should hear with great regret that any course was adopted which would have the effect of postponing the Bill. There were too many uncertainties attending every measure of law reform to allow him to view with satisfaction any step which might lead to delay. The measure itself had his most cordial concurrence, and there was but one point with respect to which he entertained any doubt. During the time the late Government was in office, and while they were engaged in the consolidation of the statutes and the assimilation of the criminal law of England and Ireland, very attentive and mature consideration was given to the question, and the unanimous opinion of all concerned was that the law should undergo the alteration which it was the object of the present Bill to effect. The matter was submitted to the Cabinet, and but for the change of Government a measure similar to that before the House would have become law some five or six years previously. He thought the only doubtful question was, whether the abolition of the whole system of forfeiture should apply to cases of high treason? He hoped his hon. Friend would persist with the Motion.

MR. HUNT said, if the hon. Gentleman would consent to withdraw the Bill and leave the matter in the hands of the Government, he would not press his Amendment.

COSTS SECURITY BILL—[BILL 58.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BUTT said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill, the object of which was to remove a grievance arising out of the existing state of the law. At present, if a person resident in England sued in an Irish court, or if a person resident in Ireland sued in an English court, he was obliged before he could proceed with his action to give security for costs, because, as he was beyond the jurisdiction of the court in which he brought the action, that court had no power of enforcing against him the payment of any costs that might be awarded. That was practically felt to be in many cases a very great grievance, and had been frequently complained of by the mercantile community. If a person in Liverpool, for instance, had a number of persons indebted to him in Ireland, and desired to take legal proceedings against them to recover the debts, he was obliged first to lodge a sum of money, perhaps £50 in each case, or to find two persons to become answerable for the costs. In fact, it was an anomaly that the inhabitants of one United Kingdom should be thus treated as foreigners in different parts of the same kingdom, and the existing state of the law had often been made use of in order to defeat a just claim. To remedy this evil he proposed, by the Bill before the House, that when an Englishman sued in Ireland, or an Irishman sued in England, he should be empowered to give, if he so thought fit, in lieu of security for costs, an undertaking under the present Bill. That would be a personal security, but the undertaking would be enforceable in any court of the United Kingdom. The same Bill was introduced last year. It received the sanction of the late Attorney General for Ireland, and passed the second reading. After it had passed the second reading it was proposed to refer it to a Commission then sitting on the practice and process of the Irish courts, and that Commission recommended that a clause should be introduced in the Bill. That had been done, but it did not affect the principle of the Bill. He had nothing further to say in respect to his Bill, except that he had made no provision for the case of the Scotch courts. The fact was that he found such difficulty in understanding the proceedings of those courts, and still greater in comprehending the terms used in them, he thought it better to relinquish the task altogether of including the Scotch courts in his measure. There would not, however, be any difficulty in introducing clauses affecting Scotland into the measure if it were allowed to go into Committee, and such was the feeling of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Butt.)

MR. WHITESIDE said, he thought that the House would hardly be induced to recognize the principle of the Bill, which was to alter that most salutary provision of the law which gave the courts either in England or Ireland the power of requiring security for costs from a stranger, or one belonging to a different country to that in which he sought to bring his action, so that the defendant, should he obtain a verdict, would have the means of reimbursing himself the costs to which he was subjected by an unjust and fraudulent action. Nothing could be fairer or more just than the existing law in that respect. Nor was any grievance likely to be inflicted, because if the party bringing the action were a respectable man and had a good case he would find no difficulty in obtaining the necessary security from his solicitor or other friends. But the effect of the Bill would be to enable a man without character or property in one division of the United Kingdom, who brought an action against a man in another division, to say to the person he sued, "You will never get anything from me if I lose the action; therefore, what will you give me to stay proceedings?" The deposit of security for costs was reasonable and fair, and calculated to prevent injustice being done under the form of law. He had seen a great many cases of hardship and injustice arising out of improper and unfounded actions at law; but he thought that such cases would be considerably augmented if the present Bill were allowed to pass into a law. What, then, was the substitute proposed by the present Bill? It was that the gentleman who had no cash, character, or case, might sign an undertaking to pay all such costs as he might be adjudged to pay. The exact value of that undertaking was the worth of the paper on which it was written; and, thinking that the Bill ought not to pass, he should move, as an Amendment, that it be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Whiteside.)

MR. VANCE said, he concurred with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Dublin University in the propriety of rejecting the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he brought forward the Bill in the interest of the mercantile community. He (Mr. Vance) was a member of that community, but he had never heard that any complaint had been made of the present practice; and at the late meetings of the Chambers of Commerce no mention of it had been made. So far from limiting the principle in the existing provision of the law, which was now sought to be altered, he should be glad to see it extended, for there were many instances of frivolous and vexatious actions being brought, occasioning a large amount of costs, and inflicting grievous injury on innocent parties.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that it appeared to him that the Bill would effect an improvement of the law, and the objections which had been urged to it did not alter his opinion on that point. The Bill did not interfere with the law relating to persons residing out of the United Kingdom, but with respect to persons in England and Ireland the effect of the Bill would be very much the same as if one legal jurisdiction extended over the two countries, and he could not help feeling that that was an improvement of the law.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, he concurred in the opinion that the provision in the Bill was a great improvement on the existing law, but he thought that some power should be given to prevent the institution of frivolous and vexatious actions. That, however, was a matter which might be taken into consideration when a Bill of the Lord Chancellor's, then before the House of Lords, came down to the Commons.

MR. BUTT stated, that his hon. Friend, whose name was on the back of the Bill (Mr. Murray), had been in frequent communication with the Chambers of Commerce of Liverpool and Manchester, and they were in favour of the Bill; and he had himself repeatedly heard from mercantile men resident in England, that the state of the law occasioned great inconvenience. It might be said that it would be no great matter for an English merchant to provide the required security, but it was felt as an annoyance that in such cases the inhabitant of the one country should be treated as a foreigner in the other country, when both those countries formed part of the same United Kingdom, and it was his object to do away with all such distinctions between the two countries.

MR. DUNLOP said, he agreed in the principle of the Bill, which, he thought, might with advantage be made to apply to all the three parts of the United Kingdom.

COUNTY VOTERS REGISTRATION BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DODSON said, he rose to move the second reading of the measure, the main object of which, as based upon the Report of a Select Committee appointed early during the Session, was to amend the registration of county voters by improving the official agency. At present the duty of keeping up the registration was left mainly to voluntary agents, who were paid out of private funds. What happened? The clerk of the peace, after the commencement of the registration season, issued a very meagre precept to the overseers to instruct them in their duties. The respective overseers then printed such parts of the existing register as related to their own parishes. Later in the season the overseers made out a list of claims sent to them by individuals. They had also power to make and to receive objections to persons on the lists on various grounds, and such objections were posted upon the church doors. Unless the party objected to resided in the parish and went to church, he knew nothing of the objection, and his name might be struck off the register. The arrangement proposed by the Bill was as follows. The clerk of the peace was to send to the overseers a precept setting forth all their duties, those duties being, in some respects, of a more positive and active character. Each overseer was then to ascertain as best he could, from the rate book taken in conjunction with other sources of information, what persons had become entitled to vote or had become disqualified. It was proposed that they should make out a list, called the supplemental list, of all the persons newly entitled to the franchise. They were further to state their objections to voters disentitled, in every case assigning the reason why. The Bill further recognized what the existing law scarcely did recognize, namely, the importance of making the register a correct statement of points not essential to the vote, such as the addresses of the voters and the description of the qualification. The overseers were, therefore, to note any errors in the entries of voters in regard to these points. The materials thus collected by the local information of the overseers were to be arranged and digested by the clerk of the peace, who would draw up the lists for publication. It was proposed to give to voters whose descriptions required correction the opportunity of making the proper correction by letter. If, after a year, they failed to furnish the necessary information, their names should be expunged from the register. The present right of individuals to make claims and objections was to be retained, but every person objected to was to receive notice of the objection and the ground of it. Any person objected to was to have an opportunity of vindicating his claim by making a statutory declaration before a magistrate, in answer to the objection. The revising barrister's powers of correcting the lists submitted to him were to be enlarged, and there was to be a more thorough and closer scrutiny of those lists than at present. The advantages of the proposed system over the present were briefly these. By means of the supplemental list it was hoped to facilitate the registration of new voters; individual claims would be facilitated by the power to make a statutory declaration in support of them; vague and vexatious objections would be checked by requiring the grounds of objection to be stated. Official would be, in a great measure, substituted for voluntary agency, and the register in all points duly corrected from time to time by responsible persons, specially employed for the purpose. The Bill would also impose a check on unfounded and fraudulent claims by subjecting new claims to a closer scrutiny. The Bill provided for the correction of the register in matters of description, which at present were "no man's business." At present the only means of correcting errors of description was by sending in new claims. The overseers would be relieved of a portion of their duties, which they were least fitted to perform. The clerk of the peace, with his legal knowledge, could greatly facilitate the future labours of the revising barrister. One other change was proposed by the Bill—a difference in the arrangement of the names. It was proposed that each parish list in the register should contain the names, not only of persons claiming to vote for property in the parish, but also the names of voters residing there who claimed to vote for property in other parishes in the same county. It was proposed that each voter should vote in the polling district in which he was resident;

the object being to get rid of duplicate numbers. Each parish list would be complete in itself, for the purpose of canvassing and voting; and that would do away with the expense of the conveyance of voters. There were some other minor changes to give effect to those which he had mentioned, but they were details fitted rather for consideration in a Committee than for discussion on the question of the second reading. The Bill was the result of the labours of a Select Committee. It had been drawn with great care and, he ventured to say, accuracy. If the House would consent to a second reading and discuss the clauses on a future day, it would be found that the Bill was calculated to make some valuable alterations in the law, which was far from satisfactory.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Dodson.)

MR. HUNT said, he would not oppose the second reading of the Bill, because it contained several provisions which he approved, but he wished it to be understood that he did not pledge himself to the whole scheme of registration as proposed. He doubted the competency of the overseers to perform the duties which it was intended to impose on them. It was doubtful, for instance, whether they should be intrusted with the power of putting names on the lists without claims having been sent in. No doubt the clerks of the peace were competent, but he was not sure that it was expedient to intrust individuals with so great a power of affecting the political character of the registration. Another ground of objection to the Bill was the expense it would involve. The clerks of the peace throughout England had held a meeting on the subject, and it appeared that the Bill would involve the employment of more clerks, and the conduct of much correspondence. Considering that the existing system of registration was tolerably cheap, he thought the House would do well to consider whether they ought to make a change involving so much expense. It was impossible that the Bill should go through without being referred to a Select Committee upstairs, and he thought the hon. Member for Sussex would do well by contenting himself with carrying the second reading, and then circulating it through the country for consideration during the recess, so that it might come up advantageously for discussion in the next Session of Parliament.

MR. COLLINS said, it was probable there would be considerable opposition to the Bill, because it would interfere with the emoluments of country attorneys, who of course would enlighten Members as to the great injury which would be done to their party thereby. The Bill, if passed in its present shape, would throw four-fifths of the work done by election agents into the hands of public officers, and the agents would only have to supplement the work instead of doing it all, as at present. The existing system was costly, not very efficient, and, in his opinion, rather discreditable. The duty of correcting the lists ought not to be left to voluntary effort. The Bill would be productive of one great advantage, that it would check the practice of making wholesale objections to voters in the hope that many of them would not appear to defend their rights. On one occasion, out of 24,000 names on the lists of voters for South Lancashire, not less than 15,000 were objected to by one party or the other, and some of them were objected to by both parties; and such a fact showed that something ought to be done to alter the existing law upon the subject. Instead of sending the Bill to a Select Committee, he would suggest that the Government should be requested to give a morning sitting for the discussion of the main points of the Bill, and then it might be brought into a shape ready for being passed next Session.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, it could not be denied that the present system of county registration was very unsatisfactory. Still the scheme proposed by the Bill was a wide scheme, and required consideration. If the hon. Member obtained a second reading for the Bill, he ought either to remit it to a Select Committee, or induce the Government to adopt it. Such a measure could not be accepted on the mere responsibility of an individual Member. If the hon. Gentleman would agree to either of these conditions, he would have no objection to the second reading.

MR. T. G. BARING said, his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was prepared to give his support to the second reading of the Bill. He thought the hon. Gentleman deserved the thanks of the House for the great pains he had taken in the matter, and he might remind the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the measure was based on the Report of a Select Committee. The Government, of course, could give no pledge to support all the provisions of the Bill, but would carefully consider them before it went into Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Wednesday next.

SERVANTS HIRING (SCOTLAND) BILL.

[BILL 108.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. DUNLOP said, that as he had no opportunity of explaining the Bill on the second reading, he wished to advert to it now in reference particularly to that part regarding farm servants, for though he proposed dropping at present, in consideration of the farming interest having been, as they thought, taken by surprise, he would propose it again next Session. By the present law of Scotland, when servants were not hired for a stated period, it was presumed that the hiring extended to a term of six months, or a year, according to the nature of the service; and the result was that, at the end of that time, servants generally left their employments, and the constant separations between masters and servants led to great inconvenience. He proposed to remedy the evil by providing that, whenever the duration of a hiring was not specified, it should be deemed to be for an indefinite period, but terminable, as in England, by a month's notice on either side. No objection, he believed, was offered to the Bill as far as it regarded domestic servants, but the farmers were under considerable apprehensions as to its effect in respect to agricultural labourers. The case of farm servants was entitled to great sympathy and consideration. Formerly the distance between the farmer and the farm servant was not great. The latter lived with his master, and from the great number of small farms, and the little capital required to cultivate them, a steady farm servant, if he saved a little money, might look forward to raising himself to the position of a farmer. The prospect of this was a great stimulus to good conduct, and a protection against the temptations to which that class are chiefly exposed. But now that farming was becoming more and more a pursuit of a manufacturing kind, and required more capital, the small farms were being swept away, and the relative position of the farmer and of the farm servant was becoming less and less familiar, while the hope of passing the gulf from the position of a farm servant to that of a farmer was nearly entirely gone, and along with it the stimulus to good conduct and industry. More care was, therefore, necessary to keep them out of the way of evil. One mischief of the existing service was, that at the close of the six months' hiring the servants were sent adrift, and they resorted to the market towns, where they stood to be hired, and were engaged generally without inquiry as to their characters. As might be expected, these meetings were productive of much profligacy and excess. He believed that the alarm of the farmers was groundless, that the measure would tend to foster more satisfactory relations between them and their servants, that it would lead them to be more considerate and accommodating towards each other, and that consequently it would give permanence to the engagements between them. He trusted also that the moral condition of the employed would be greatly improved. He proposed, however, for the present to omit the words "farm servants" from the Bill; but, if the Bill should pass, he hoped next year to propose an extension of its provisions to that class. Many intelligent and benevolent persons in Scotland, he might add, cordially supported him in the endeavour to pass the Bill.

MR. BLACK said, he was reluctant to oppose a measure which he knew was proposed with a desire to promote morality and good order amongst the servants in Scotland. If the hon. Member had persevered with the second part of the Bill, relating to farm servants, a great deal of good might have been done. As the Bill stood, however, he thought that the advantage in the case of female domestic servants would be altogether in favour of the master and against the servant. The knowledge on the part of masters and servants that they were compelled to live together for six months very often led to their making up their differences and living amicably together. As far as he had been able to learn, the proposed change was not desired by one person in ten in Scotland, and he hoped it would not be allowed to be carried out. Among other public bodies, the Highland and Agricultural Society was unanimously against it, and the great majority of the farmers were likewise opposed to it. He should move that the House should go into Committee on the Bill that day three months.

Mr. T. G. Baring

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Black,)

—instead thereof.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he doubted whether the Bill, if passed into law, would improve the condition or morality of the farm servants in Scotland. Statute fairs, though giving rise occasionally to scenes of impropriety, were yet a great boon to the respectable portion of the farm labourers. He doubted whether the hon. Gentleman had gone the right way to work in the remedy which he had proposed. In Scotland the farm servant held his cottage not from the lord of the manor but from the farmer who employed him, and if his hiring was terminable on a month's notice he might be turned out of his home at a time when he might not be able to get either work or a lodging. As regarded the farmer, a dishonest labourer, if he could leave at a month's notice, might quit his service at the most critical time of the crops, or, taking advantage of the month's notice, demand exorbitant wages. He thought, however, that the provisions of the Bill might be applied with advantage to domestic servants, who stood in a different position from agricultural labourers. He had heard great complaints in Scotland of the six months' engagement of domestic servants, and thought that the custom in England was preferable. To remedy the inconvenience felt from the old term being kept in some places with the new term in others, he would on some future occasion propose to provide that the half-yearly terms—where no stipulation to the contrary existed—should be the 11th May and 15th November.

MR. CAIRD said, that as regarded that part of the proposal which related to farm servants the information upon which the hon. Gentleman had proceeded was of a limited nature, and did not apply to farm labourers throughout Scotland generally. He did not know a more intelligent or respectable class of men than the farm servants in Scotland. He deprecated the introduction of anything calculated to sever the connection which then existed between them and their masters. He believed that the present measure would have that tendency, inasmuch as it would give the master power to dismiss his married farm servant upon one month's notice, the house of the latter being generally considered as part of his yearly wages. He (Mr. Caird) spoke as an experienced man upon the question, and he advised the hon. Gentleman, before he proceeded further with his measure, to seek for further information as to its objects and effects.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the system which at present prevailed was a one-sided system, inasmuch as it was binding against the employer but not against the employed. He had once a keeper who, he discovered, was a great poacher, and, as he detected him in the act, he, of course, dismissed him upon the spot. But that man brought an action against him, and he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had actually to pay him six months' wages. Was not such a state of things monstrously unjust? With regard to farm servants, he could not agree in the opinion expressed by his hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Sir James Fergusson). He considered that the system of hiring for six months led to a state of things that was disgraceful to a civilized society. He regretted that the hon. and learned Gentleman had withdrawn that part of the Bill which related to farm servants. He trusted they would receive the amount of protection proposed by the Bill—namely, that in the absence of any specific agreement the hiring of servants should be held to be on the same basis as in England—namely, one month's warning or one month's wages.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART thought that great inconvenience arose from the different character of the hiring in Scotland to what it was in the other parts of the United Kingdom. On the whole, he preferred the system that prevailed in Scotland.

SIR MICHAEL SHAW STEWART admitted that the measure would be worthy of their best consideration if it tended to diminish the evils attending the holiday system; but he doubted much whether any legislation in that shape would have the effect supposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman who introduced it.

COLONEL SYKES said, he viewed the Bill as a harmless measure, inasmuch as it would not interfere with the practice in Scotland except in cases where there was no specific agreement entered into.

Mr. FINLAY said, he hoped the Bill would pass, and he was only sorry that the most important clauses had been withdrawn.

Mr. DUNLOP said, the class of whom he spoke was that of unmarried farm servants. He was glad the discussion had taken place, and he assured the hon. Member for Stirling that he would consider his suggestions. All he proposed was, that people should be left free to make a contract; but if they made no contract then the hiring should be for one month.

NAVAL GUNNERY.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he wished to ask the noble Duke the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that the Government have determined to alter the Armstrong guns so as to make them muzzle-loaders, and also to form the interior on the shunt principle of the Armstrong gun? He believed that the experiments at Shoeburyness between Sir William Armstrong's gun and Mr. Whitworth's had not been concluded, and he would therefore only express a hope that the Government would not act precipitately in the matter.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that the Government about two years ago ordered a number of seventy-pounders to be constructed, part at Woolwich and part at Elswick, so that the service should not be left without a supply of guns; but the Admiralty had not yet been able to pronounce whether muzzle-loading guns should be definitively adopted or not for the naval service. The guns which had been made could easily be adapted to either muzzle or breech-loading. When the experiments were concluded, the report and the decision of the Government should be laid before Parliament at the earliest possible moment.

COUNTY COURTS AMENDMENT BILL.

PETITION.

LORD BROUGHAM said, a petition on a most important subject had been intrusted to him by the inhabitants of Nottingham, chiefly of the trading class. They felt the greatest alarm at the County Court Bill now before the House. One part they highly approved—the extension of equitable jurisdiction, but they objected strongly to the limitation of one year in simple contract debts. His noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor had announced his intention of changing that from one to three years; the Petition earnestly prayed he would also abandon or greatly alter the part of the Bill which alarmed them most—the abolishing imprisonment for small debts. They considered this at once most injurious to them, the great bulk of debts due to them being of small amount, and it would at once close the County Courts, from which they derived so great a benefit. This he stated to be quite true, according to all the opinions of the County Court Judges. Of sixty who returned answers without any concert whatever, fifty-eight were decidedly against the provisions of the Bill, one had doubts, and only one of the whole body approved of it. Nothing could be more inaccurate than the representation of the great numbers of commitments. There were 900,000 suits yearly in these courts, and of these not above 9,000, or 1 per cent, led to the judgment summons, which is the only possibility of commitment. In the superior Courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, there were eight times the number of arrests in proportion to the number of actions. But the judgment summons only led to actual commitment in a few cases. Thus, in one County Court, in 5,500 suits, these being the usual proportion of 1 per cent, of 550 of these summonses only thirty-seven led to commitment, all the others having led to payment or settlement. And of these thirty-seven only nine actually went to prison, the other twenty-eight having paid when arrested. Now, but for the fear of commitment, none of them would in all probability have paid. It was absolutely necessary that the imprisonment should be held over the heads of these debtors. He (Lord Brougham) considered that a most salutary course was pursued by some County Court Judges, Sir E. Wilmot and Mr. Dasent especially. Indeed, Mr. Dasent had furnished most valuable information on the whole subject in his very able answer to the question proposed. The course recommended was to suspend for a short time, as a month, the execution of the order, and in the course of this month the greater number paid. He (Lord Brougham) thought a provision should be inserted in the Bill, not compulsory, but giving the Judge a discretion to suspend for a time to be defined. He trusted, for the sake of trade and of the County Courts, that the prayer of the petitioners would be granted.

CHAIN CABLES AND ANCHORS BILL.

[No. 101.]—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE EARL OF CAITHNESS expressed the hope that provision would be made for examining the iron and workmanship of cables and anchors, as well as for testing the finished article. It sometimes happened that when an extreme strain had been tried a fracture occurred upon a second test, even before the extreme strain was reached. Bessemer steel would stand 50 or 60 per cent more of tensile strain than the best Low Moor iron.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that he had communicated with the Board of Trade, and should not press the exemption which had been referred to on a former occasion.

IMPROVEMENT OF LAND ACTS (1864)

BILL—[No. 122.]—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD ST. LEONARDS, who was almost inaudible, was understood to object to many of the provisions of the Bill, and to say that in his opinion a more hazardous measure had never been brought forward.

LORD PORTMAN did not think that the Bill was open to so much objection as the noble and learned Lord appeared to think. Many private Acts contained the powers embodied in this general Bill. He thought great advantages would attend the passing of the Act in this respect, that whereas some of the clauses gave powers and facilities not afforded by the existing state of the law, any railway company seeking to have the benefit of them would have to come under the whole of the regulations of the Bill. The railway companies who thus adopted the Act would be put under a restraint to which they were not at present subjected.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY thought the landed interest generally were much indebted to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack for having not only collected the various statutes on this subject and consolidated the law, but also for encouraging a principle which, instead of being detrimental, would be of great advantage to the landed interest.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was placed at a disadvantage in replying to the objections of his noble and learned Friend by the circumstance that he had not been able to hear more than one word out of twenty that were spoken by his noble and learned Friend. He could only say that, if the law relating to landed property had been allowed to remain in all respects as it was sixty years ago, that law would have operated as a continual drag upon the progress of society. Land ought not to be kept strictly bound by the system which prevailed in former times, but facilities should be afforded for improvements by the owners. It was desirable to make the law and its amendments keep pace with the interests of society, and to further instead of retarding them. The noble and learned Lord had objected that a tenant for twenty-five years should have the power of charging an estate; but from this it would appear that the noble and learned Lord had not read the Bill. It was provided that no charge could be created for more than twenty-five years, and in ordinary cases the tenant for life might be expected to survive that term, so that the estate would be handed down to his successor improved and unencumbered. Of late years powers for the improvement of land had been given to private companies, varying and conflicting in their character, and it had become necessary that the Legislature should step in and create, once for all, such definite general powers as ought to be given. That object was sought to be attained by the present Bill. Its provisions had been discussed with the greatest care in the Select Committee, and had been adopted after full comparison of the existing powers granted to various companies. He believed that the Bill if passed would confer great advantages on the country.

EARL GREY said, that if the noble and learned Lord (Lord St. Leonards) wished to abolish the whole system of settlement of landed estates, he had only to act upon the narrow principle of preventing improvements which seemed to meet with his approbation. It was only the relaxation of the old laws during the last twenty years, which had prevented the law of settled estates from being swept away as an intolerable nuisance to the country. Since the repeal of the Corn Laws in 1846, an enormous sum of money had been laid out in the improvement of land under the powers granted to private companies.

The Earl of Malmesbury

Without those powers those improvements could not have been effected, and much injury and even ruin would have befallen many proprietors of land. One witness who was examined before the Committee stated that he himself had valued land in Scotland for improvements to the extent of a million sterling. As he (Earl Grey) was the person who first proposed to extend to the construction of railways the same facilities for raising money which had already been given for the improvement of land, he wished to add one word upon that subject. It was clearly proved before the Committee last year, that a railway in the vicinity of a landed estate was an improvement as ascertainable as draining, building, or any other work. The Bill, as it stood, only proposed that money should be charged on land to the extent of the annual increase of value given to it by the projected railway, on the supposition that not one farthing was received in shares. He might mention an instance in which the construction of a railway near certain lands on the Humber, had increased the annual value from £1,150 a year, to £1,540 a year, and the object of the present Bill was to give facilities for such improvements as that. If they adhered to the principle already adopted, there was no reason for excluding railways from participating in the advantage.

LORD ST. LEONARDS assured his noble and learned Friend that he never had been opposed to rational progress and improvement; nor had any one assisted more than he had, in removing from the statute-book all enactments which were no longer necessary.

LORD REDESDALE said, he certainly agreed with this Bill, which would be a great improvement on the existing state of things. He was extremely anxious that the measure should be made compulsory on all companies. He had made this proposition in the Select Committee, and regretted exceedingly that his proposition had not been accepted.

LORD BROUGHAM wished to say two words in justice to his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards). It was a very great mistake to suppose or represent him as an enemy to the improvement of the law. He had some right to speak on that subject, as no one had taken greater part than he had done during the last forty years in effecting changes, and what were considered improvements in the law. Now, he could answer for his noble and learned Friend — on no occasion, whether in office, before he acceded to office, or since leaving office, had he been a decided persevering adversary of these improvements. On the contrary, he was bound to bear testimony to the great value of the help he had received in all those measures from his noble and learned Friend.

The clauses of the Bill, as amended by the Select Committee, were then presented, read, and agreed to.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS BILL—(No. 128.) [H.L.]

THIRD READING.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE said, he desired to make a few remarks on the subject. It so happened that he had some personal experience of one of the great schools included in the list of his noble Friend below (the Earl of Clarendon). He believed that all the others, with the exception of those in the City of London, were more or less founded on the same system, and therefore in making a few remarks on the system established and practised in the school in which he received his education—he meant Eton—he was not likely to deviate from what would apply more or less to the other schools. From the experience he had had—and he entered Eton at a very early age, between seven and eight—he wished to bear his testimony to what he believed most firmly to be the truth—namely, that the system in respect to its fundamental principles was substantially sound and good. What were the points of that system? If he was not greatly mistaken they were, instruction in the first instance, then health, and formation of character. He had been brought up in the persuasion that, of all human languages, whether ancient or modern, Latin was the most logical in its construction; and with respect to Greek he believed that there was no language, unless it was modern German, which could compete with it in the power of expansion or in comprehensiveness. He could, therefore, conceive no better foundation for the study of language than on the one hand the most logical, and on the other the most comprehensive of languages. The system at Eton consisted of short school hours, with intervals between them; and thus the boys had opportunities for engaging in games of a manly description, which brought them into frequent intercourse with each other, and served to strengthen and develop their physical constitutions. Another most essential point in regard to such institutions was their influence in the formation of character. In this respect the system at Eton was that of leaving the boys as much to themselves as the course of instruction and necessary discipline of the school would allow, and certainly much more than was the case in private schools; and he thought this system tended to promote self-respect and the avoidance of many faults and vices, and qualified the boys for the position they were to fill in after life. Our public schools, however, like all other human institutions, were liable to abuse; and it might well be that, having been in existence for centuries, they were susceptible of improvement. He had, therefore, heard of the appointment of the Commission on the subject with satisfaction, and as far as he had read the voluminous reports on the table, he had derived a general impression very favourable to those who conducted the inquiry. But it should be borne in mind that the system pursued at Eton was designed for instruction in studies which were not of a nature to be practised at home. The boys would generally acquire a knowledge of their vernacular tongue at home, and the same remark applied to a great extent to an acquaintance with English literature. As to the introduction of new subjects of study, it was most undesirable that anything should be done which might have the effect of lowering the character of great national institutions like these, and there were many things which could hardly be introduced into the course of study without having that effect. He very much doubted whether any legislation in detail on this subject would be desirable. He did not object to an inquiry by Commission, in order to ascertain the requirements which the progress of time made necessary in those schools; but he should lament to see Parliament assuming the performance of a duty which could best be discharged by the masters.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, it seemed to him that very little improvement was likely to be effected in this matter, unless some addition were made to the number and quality of the tutors. Everybody saw how difficult it was for tutors at public schools to discharge the duties of parents and relatives, and act as if they were the parents of the children they had to teach. His noble Friend (Earl Stanhope) said, the other day, he wished to accommodate the system to meet the case of all boys, some of whom were idle, and some dull. Now he did not think they would be successful in reaching those peculiar cases by the plan they proposed of the alteration of the statutes, unless they succeeded in obtaining men who took an interest in their business, and who would employ their minds and energies in rebuking the idle, and taking care to help forward the diligent as much as possible. They had heard a great deal of the system of Dr. Arnold and the system of other men, but he believed the system of a man to be the man himself—and from his long experience in matters of this nature he felt certain that no kind of arrangement they could make in the way of rules and regulations could compensate for the want of the living energies of a man.

LORD CAMPBELL thought it would be useful to refer to the points suggested by the Bill on which there seemed to be a general concurrence of opinion. On all sides it was admitted that the ancient languages ought not to lose the supremacy in public schools which had hitherto belonged to them; that mathematics ought to be more encouraged than they had been; that the elements of science ought to be made use of in instruction; that military drill which had been recently established in public schools ought to be perpetuated; and that French should be made to form an essential part of education. He referred to the manly and enlightened views of Mr. William Johnson, an assistant master at Eton, on the latter point, and to the support which the Under Secretary of State—Lord Wodehouse—had lately given them. In spite of the general concurrence as to what ought to be done, there was no definite opinion as to how the necessary changes should be brought about. Direct legislation would not answer such a purpose. Parliament could never make itself in detail the taskmaster of public schools. It would not be easy for the authorities of Eton to act on the Report of the Commissioners, however much they wished to do so. They would be held back by no less than three impediments; fear of the parents who might not all approve of the reforms; fear of the school which had a strong spirit of conservative resistance; and fear of innovation which presented to their mind a mass of possible disorders. But the hope and view of the Commissioners was that their reforms would be brought about by the new governing bodies of public schools proposed to be created. He (Lord Campbell) was anxious for a moment to warn the House against that expectation. The new governing body of Eton, as sketched by the Commissioners, was so complex in its structure that no one could now divine the materials of which it might consist in the first instance. Beyond that there was the greatest possible uncertainty as to when it would come into existence. An Act of Parliament would be necessary for each governing body. Six or seven Bills would, therefore, come under discussion. They would open questions as to corporate prescription, vested rights, and the authority of founders. They might lead to party conflict, and no one could foresee in what manner they would issue. But it was yet more important to consider the elements of discord, and the obstacles to action which the governing body proposed for Eton would contain. According to the plan of the Commissioners it was to be formed of the Provost and fourteen Fellows. The Fellows were to be stipendiary and honorary; five of the first class; nine of the second. The nine honorary Fellows had a threefold subdivision. One would be the Provost of King's; three would be appointed by the Crown, and five elected by the whole governing body. The stipendiary Fellows were to be divided into three clergymen and two laymen. The first element of conflict which occurred to any one who glanced at such a project was the probable antagonism of the new body with the Headmaster, who had no power to control it. These differences appeared to be inevitable between the honorary and stipendiary Fellows. The nominees of the Crown would clash with the elected members in the former section. Again the chance discord was provided in the solitary action of the Provost of King's. And, as regarded the latter section, the five stipendiary Fellows, a standing difficulty might arise between the clerical and lay ingredients it endeavoured to assimilate. It was not enough to say that such a body wanted the conditions of a reforming one—namely, simplicity and unity. Simplicity and unity had been ingeniously, and after much design, eliminated from it. Such a body might be admirable to give steadiness and firmness to a system of instruction well matured and previously established. But it was clearly not adapted to invade prejudices, modify abuses, and inaugurate reforms. The power which apparently characterized it without any limit was the vis inertia by which decisions were arrested and debates prolonged. If at the end of the last century the Abbé Sieyès had been engaged to frame an Eton constitution he could not have produced one more elaborate, more intricate, more full of balances and checks, more incapable of movement and of action. It was not the Abbé Sieyès however, but Ovid, who had given its conception, when he said—

..... "Corporè in uno,
Frigida pugnabant calidis, humentia siccis,
Mollia cum duris, sine pondere habentia pondus."

These lines nearly shadowed a facsimile—since in one body, corpore in uno, the Commissioners resolved to join elements of zeal and elements of coldness, minds notoriously dry with minds of vigour and exuberance; men prone to yield and others certain of resisting; characters of gravity and weight with persons utterly deficient in these qualities. He (Lord Campbell) had ventured thus to criticize the new body which had been designed to govern Eton, only to establish this important proposition, that they must look to some other agency to bring about the changes generally wished for. Neither immediate legislation as to studies, nor the authorities existing now, nor the proposed body, could be described as equal to that purpose. The proposed body might have every advantage as an agency for governing, but was not to be relied on as an agency to initiate reform. He would venture to suggest, therefore, to the noble Lord (Lord Clarendon) and to the Government, that they should seriously weigh the course adopted a few years ago towards the University of Cambridge, where an Executive Commission was empowered to make statutes. An Executive Commission, created by an Act of Parliament, might at once proceed to the public schools and give effect to the Report of the Commissioners. It might be formed of the very persons by whom the inquiry had been so long and so diligently prosecuted. At least, his noble Friend (Lord Clarendon) might be at the head of it. Would anybody doubt that his noble Friend, at the head of an Executive Commission, would be more apt and more effective to introduce his own reforms than a mysteriously constituted body, to be called into existence at a time they could not calculate at present. As they were still six weeks from the ordinary termination of the Session, there was no difficulty as to passing the necessary Act of Parliament. A noble Earl on the other side (the Earl of Malmesbury) had regretted the exposure which the blue-books invoked. If there was such an exposure as to gratify unfavourable critics of our public schools, either abroad or in this country, it was too late to recall it. The only question they could influence was whether the exposure should be the ground for merited reproach, or the path to long desired improvement. The whole House joined in aspiring to the latter of these two results; and he had ventured to submit to the House and to the Government, what appeared to be the only means by which that result could be, with any ease or with any certainty, accomplished.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 3<sup>a</sup> and passed, and sent to the Commons.

NEEDLEWOMEN OF LONDON—REPORT OF THE COMMISSION.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that before the House adjourned he desired to ask a Question of the noble Earl the President of the Council. It would be recollected that last year the death of a needlewoman employed in a millinery establishment in the West End was caused partly by overwork and partly by the abominable and discreditable condition of the room in which she was employed. On the attention of the Government being called to the case, they promised that the subject of the ventilation of workrooms should be inquired into by a Commission then sitting; but up to the present time, though nearly a year had elapsed, neither their Lordships nor the country had heard anything more of the matter. He begged to ask, therefore, when the Report of the Commissioners would be produced. It was also well known that the large body of persons, who might be classed under the name of tailors, suffered from the same want of proper sanitary regulations, and he hoped that something would be done on their behalf. The waste of life which now occurred was such that, whether they looked to individuals or the community, the subject was of too much importance to be neglected. All he desired was that the Report should be printed and laid on the table as soon as possible, and he hoped the noble Earl would use his best efforts to secure this result before Parliament was prorogued.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there could be no objection to do what the noble Earl suggested. Having made inquiry that day respecting the Report of the Commission, he found that it would be presented before the end of the Session.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, the Commissioners had conducted their inquiry with so much zeal and ability that he should be loth to say one word against them. But he thought they had formed a wrong judgment in withholding their Report upon the milliners and dress-makers. They might have presented this Report at the beginning of the Session, but for their wish to combine with it the Report upon the needlewomen and slop-women of the East of London. Now, though there might be a difficulty in drawing a logical distinction between the two classes, there was a real distinction between them which everybody could understand; and if this delay had not taken place, Parliament might have legislated to meet a great and crying evil—an evil which was to be remedied by sanitary rather than by other regulations. He was glad that his noble Friend had called attention to the case of the tailors, because, though it did not come within the scope of inquiry, yet the waste of life among them was such as to make it of the greatest importance to them and their families that the evils which affected them should be redressed; moreover, the sanitary condition of those men and of many more like them was of national importance, not only on account of the waste of life, but the waste of health, which every year threw thousands and tens of thousands upon the poor rates. He felt certain that if the Legislature had wisdom enough to pass good sanitary laws and compel their adoption by a system of Inspectorship, the burden upon the rates of this country would be reduced by, at least, one-third in the course of the next five years.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow half past Seven o'clock.

QUESTION.

MR. DOULTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What are the difficulties in the way of carrying into effect the City Traffic Regulation Act of last Session, and whether any steps have been taken for their removal?

SIR GEORGE GREY replied that, on looking through these regulations, which were numerous, a doubt arose whether some of them were not beyond the powers conferred by the Act of Parliament, and they were, therefore, referred to the Law Officers of the Crown for their opinion. They gave their opinion that several of the regulations were beyond the powers of the Act. He (Sir George Grey) thereupon returned the regulations to the authorities of the City, with a Copy of the Opinions of the Law Officers, that they might see to which of the regulations the objection applied. That was done on the 25th of April, 1864, and he had not received any further communication from the City authorities on the subject.

RAILWAYS IN CHINA.—QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Sir Macdonald Stephenson has lately been travelling in China at the expense of the British Government, or at his own expense, merely with the sanction of the Foreign Office; and if he will lay upon the table of the House his Report on the possibility of introducing Railways into China?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, he believed Sir Macdonald Stephenson had been travelling in China, but certainly not at the expense of the Foreign Office. He could not say if he paid his own expenses or not, for he was not aware under what auspices he was travelling. He understood he had made a Report, but not an official document, and a copy of it had been sent to Earl Russell, but as it was not in an official form he was not able to lay it upon the table of the House.

EDUCATION—SCIENCE CERTIFICATE. QUESTION.

MR. MUNDY said, he would beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, What Clause in the Revised Code prevents a Certificated Elementary Teacher having a Pupil Teacher, and holding a Science Certificate, from receiving payment for the results of his Science Teaching?

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, in reply, that the limitation referred to was not imposed by the Revised Code, but by the Committee of Council on Science and Art. It was obvious that the schoolmaster, who might be obliged to attend an elementary school two or three times a day, and was also bound to discharge the duty of superintending pupil-teachers, could not have much time to attend to the study of science and art. Schoolmasters were often ready to undertake these duties, and to overtax their strength; but it was clear that either the school and pupil-teachers, or the School of Science and Art, must be neglected.

IRELAND—DAUNT'S ROCK. QUESTION.

MR. HORSFALL said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any steps are being taken for blasting Daunt's Rock, or for placing a Light Vessel with Fog Signals, to prevent a recurrence of accidents?

MR. MILNER GIBSON, in reply, said, there was no intention of blasting Daunt's Rock, or of placing a Light Ship there, but sanction had been given for placing a large bell buoy for warning vessels in foggy weather, and sanction had also been given for improving the Light at Roche's Point, but no further steps had been taken.

THE IRISH FISHERIES.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. MONSELL,

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, there was no difficulty either in Law or in fact with regard to the appeals under the Fisheries

Act. The Legal Commissioners had to sign each appeal before it could be taken to the Queen's Bench, and he believed Mr. Lane, the new Commissioner, would be competent to do so; and in all the cases accurate shorthand notes had been preserved, so that no legal difficulty would arise.

ARMY—THE ARMSTRONG GUN. QUESTION.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any truth in the report that it is the intention of the Government to convert a considerable number of Armstrong Breech-loading Guns into Muzzle-loaders, and to rifle them on Sir William Armstrong's shunt principle; and, if so, whether he will lay upon the table of the House a Copy of any Report, or the results of any experiments, on which it has been resolved to adopt the shunt principle of rifling?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, it was perfectly true that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to finish a considerable number of guns that had been waiting for two or three years, which had been completed up to a state when it became necessary to rifle them. They were originally prepared as breech-loaders, on the wedge principle, and it was intended to convert them into muzzle-loaders, and to rifle them on the shunt principle. The reason for this was owing to the delay which had taken place from various causes, but in a great measure from delays of which Mr. Whitworth was himself the cause. The trials only began two months ago, and they were not likely to be brought to a conclusion much before the termination of this year. The Admiralty had been for some time pressing for a supply of 70-pounder guns for the requirements of the service; and it was impossible to delay longer the providing them with one gun or another. They ultimately came to the conclusion that for the object for which these guns were intended muzzle-loading guns would be preferable to breech-loaders; and as the shunt principle was one of which the department had had most experience, and had already produced very favourable results, it was decided to rifle them upon that principle. Besides that, it must be recollected that these guns were manufactured by Sir William Armstrong and adapted to his principle, and probably it would not at all have been satisfactory if any other system of rifling, recommended by any other inventor, had been applied to them. However the determination of the War Office did not in the least bind them to the adoption of the shunt principle, the principle proposed by Mr. Whitworth, or any other for rifling future guns. With regard to the latter part of the question of the hon. Member, the system had been extensively tried at Shoeburyness, and on board the gunnery-practice ship Excellent at Portsmouth. The War Department had a great number of Reports on the subject, and he was not aware there was any objection to lay them on the table. They would take a considerable time to prepare, and as no definite resolution had been come to in regard to the system to be adopted, he thought it would be better to defer their production for the present.

THE ASHANTEE WAR QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY: It will be in the recollection of the House that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies, in reply to a Question from the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), in May, promised that the Ashantee war should be put a stop to, and a transport sent to fetch away the troops. I wish to ask the noble Lord, Whether, in accordance with the promise given before Whitsuntide, any transports have been sent to convey troops from the Gold Coast, what number of men are to be conveyed, and when the ship sailed?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, I will state the arrangements which have been made for removing the troops which it is intended to transfer from Cape Coast Castle to the West Indies. We have taken up a transport, which is to proceed, and will be ready to proceed, in two days, to the Cape de Verd Islands. We have likewise ordered the Gladiator, a paddle-steamer, to proceed at once to Cape Coast Castle to bring the troops, calling at Sierra Leone, to the Cape de Verd Islands, there to meet the transport, which will convey them thence to the West Indies. We expect that the transport will have arrived at the Cape de Verd Islands in time to await the arrival of the Gladiator with the troops on board.

SIR JOHN HAY: The numbers?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: The number of those whom it is intended to remove is slightly above 500.

SIR JOHN HAY: I have also a Question to put to the Under Secretary of State for War, of which I have given him notice. I wish to ask him, How it is that only one transport for 500 men is provided, when the Returns in the hands of Members this morning show 1,402 men at Cape Coast Castle, in addition to the garrison of 300 men, and whether there is reason to suppose, as I fear there is too good reason, that 1,000 men have died?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I hope, Sir, there is no reason to suppose that 1,000 of the men at Cape Coast Castle have died; on the contrary, the last Return received from there showed that the rank and file, at least, were not suffering from any great amount of sickness. The promise which was given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies was, I believe, that those troops who had been sent from the West Indies to the Gold Coast for the objects of this war should be removed, and that the force at the Gold Coast should be reduced to its normal strength. It had been decided, long before the outbreak of hostilities, that the force permanently to be stationed at the Gold Coast should for the future consist of one battalion. The removal of these 500 or 550 men from Cape Coast will leave between 700 and 800 men, which is the force that it is proposed permanently to station there.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he wished to ask whether it is true, that of fifty-one officers landed at Cape Coast Castle thirteen had already died, while ten others were sick from the effects of climate? Also whether, out of 1,400 men landed, 600, within a short time after their arrival, were either dead or invalided?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is quite true that within the last year thirteen officers have died on the Gold Coast, and about the number which has been mentioned by my hon. Friend were invalided. The Returns have been laid on the table this evening, and will be in the hands of Members to-morrow.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I wish to ask when the order was given for the Gladiator to proceed to the coast of Africa, and whether she will afford proper accommodation for 500 men?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: To-day the Gladiator was ordered to proceed to the Gold Coast. We have no reason to believe that her accommodation will prove insufficient for the troops she is to take.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE asked

the noble Lord to state the name of the transport which was to proceed to the Cape de Verd Islands, and why she could not go straight to the Gold Coast. Was the Gladiator to perform the service for which she was intended in one or more trips?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET : The reason we have sent the transport to the Cape de Verd Islands is in order to save time. She would have to beat up against contrary winds in order to get to Cape Coast Castle, and we think time will be saved by sending the Gladiator, which is a steamer, to carry the troops thence to the Cape de Verd Islands. She can do this in one trip.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the name of the transport, or the class to which she belonged, has not been stated.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET : I cannot tell my hon. Friend the name. She is, however, a sailing ship.

CAPTAIN TALBOT asked when the transport was taken up for this service?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET : She was taken up immediately upon the requisition of the War Office ; I think on the 26th of May, or about the end of that month. We have had her fitted out at once ; the men have been working day and night to get her ready.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE CHARITY COMMISSIONERS.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. FERRAND said, he rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the construction, the expense, and the working of the Board of Charity Commissioners. He hoped he should be able to make out such a case as would induce a large majority to support him on a division should the Government oppose his Motion. And he was the more encouraged to propose his Motion from the fact, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had repeatedly during the present Session called on hon. Members on both sides of the House to assist him in reducing the expenditure of the country, without which it was impossible to keep it within proper limits. Not long since the Chancellor of the Exchequer attacked several hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House for having shown, as he stated, a disposition to increase the expenditure of the country without just grounds ; and although he entirely differed from the right hon. Gentleman in that opinion, it the more fortified him in the conviction that he should have the right hon. Gentleman's support if he found it necessary to divide the House. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Marsh), in an able speech, had lately reviewed the expenditure of the country ; and the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to him, stated that he would give his support to any hon. Member who brought forward any instance of an unjust and improper application of the taxes ; and, therefore, he also looked to that right hon. Gentleman for his support on that occasion. When the Charity Board was formed under the Act of 1853, Her Majesty's Government distinctly stated that in all probability the expenses of the Board would not amount to more than between £5,000 and £6,000 per annum, but the expenses this year, according to the Votes, amounted to the enormous sum of £18,250. In 1830, when the Tories were driven from power by the Whig cry of "peace, retrenchment, and reform," the civil service expenditure only amounted to £1,872,000; but it then amounted to no less a sum than £8,000,000. Out of the thirty years the Whigs had held office twenty-seven years, and there could be no doubt whatever that a great portion of the increased expenditure had arisen from jobbery of the gravest kind on the part of Whig Governments during that period. Now as to the construction of the Charity Board. The Charity Board had been in existence ten years. It was a secret tribunal, with the proceedings of which the public were unacquainted except from the very meagre accounts that were annually laid by them upon the table of the House. At the commencement of the Session he asked for a return of the names, salaries, and trades or professions of the members of the Board; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), though willing to furnish the names of the members and the amount of salary which each received, thought it his duty to resist the latter part of his Motion ; but he (Mr. Ferrand) would have occasion before he concluded to call attention to the trade or profession of some of the members. The Return on the table justified the expression he had used in moving for it—that the Board was "a snug nest of Whigs." There were no less than forty persons connected with the Board, every one of whom, with a single exception, belonged to the Whig party. There had been grievous complaints for a length of time made against the Charity Board. Since he gave notice of his intention to bring its construction and its working under the notice of the House, he had received hundreds of letters from various parts of the country complaining of the manner in which the affairs connected with that Board were carried out to the injury of the various charities. In those communications the Commissioners were charged with negligence, ignorance, offensive letter writing, maladministration, misappropriation, and political partisanship. The Inspectors were charged with dereliction of duty and drawing up false Reports. When he moved for this Return the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) declared that the members of the Board were among the most industrious, honourable, and valuable of Her Majesty's public servants. There was a great difference between the opinion of the public and the opinion of the unpaid Commissioner who represented that Board in the House of Commons, and he would endeavour to show who was nearer the truth. The Board of Charity Commissioners was originally intended to superintend the various charities in the country, to be a court of appeal, to receive addresses, and hear and determine calls for assistance. But by various Bills introduced into that House in two or three instances, during the last few days of the Session of Parliament, the Board had become possessed of the most unconstitutional powers. The Commissioners and the Inspectors were clothed with judicial powers. They had the right to go into any part of England and Wales, and there hold courts, to summon before them persons of all ranks and all classes residing within ten miles; if they should be of opinion that a witness had given false evidence they had power to order him to be indicted for a misdemeanor; and if any witness so summoned should refuse to attend, they had the power of declaring him guilty of contempt of the Court of Chancery. These were great powers for any person or any body in this country to possess, powers which were never possessed by any Board or any body of officers previous to the construction of the Board of Charity Commissioners. Beyond that, it was necessary that the Charity Commissioners and Inspectors should be men of the highest integrity and honour, and probity, for they had to inquire into charities possessed of a large amount of property; they had to inquire into charges of dereliction, maladministration, and misappropriation of the funds. There was, however, an opinion abroad that these Commissioners and Inspectors, as he had before shown, had neglected their duty in the grossest manner. He would confirm that statement as far as his own neighbourhood was concerned, and he had been urged by various parties in Yorkshire to bring the question before the House of Commons. He had been told by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Malins) that the Commissioners were highly respectable, honourable, and eminent men, and that one of their body was brother to Lord Chief Justice Erle. He had never disputed that Mr. Erle was the brother of the Lord Chief Justice. He had merely said that the Commissioners had not done their duty as they ought to have done. The question was not as to their eminence or respectability. The question was, had they faithfully, diligently, honestly, effectually discharged the duties imposed upon them by the House of Commons when the Board was constructed? Before the present Board was constructed in 1853, all the preliminary work had been done for them, and their labour ought to be very light. The House was little aware of the large sums which the Government had paid for inquiries into the state of the charities. In 1818 Lord Brougham, then Mr. Brougham, who had taken great interest in the subject of charities, obtained the appointment of ten Commissioners under the title of the Charitable Trusts Commissioners to inquire into the charities; the Commission lasted eleven years; and each Commissioner received by Act of Parliament £1,000 a year, besides £800 a year for expenses. The total sum allowed between the years 1818 and 1831 for expenses amounted to the enormous sum of £198,000. That Commission expired in 1830. In 1831 Lord Brougham, still a Member of the House of Commons, obtained an Act for renewing the Commission till 1834; and the total cost during that interval was £72,000. In 1835, the time when Whig Commissioners, like a flight of locusts, seized on the taxes of this country, a Commission of thirty Commissioners was appointed, twenty of whom were paid out of the civil service fund. That Commission expired in two years, in 1837. The expenses amounted to £45,695. The total sum paid to Commissioners for inquiring into the public charities of the kingdom up to 1835 amounted to £315,690, which gave an average of twelve guineas for each of the charities of England and Wales. Besides these enormous grants there was the cost of printing thirty-eight folio volumes of Reports, in which the results of the inquiries were embodied, and which he believed would take fifty years for any hon. Member to read through. The result was that £1,000,000 worth of charity property was recovered from those who had unjustly taken possession of it. The number of all the charities in the kingdom was 28,484, of which number more than 22,000 were below £30 a year, and 25,000 of these charities were subject to the control of the Board of Charity Commissioners. The whole of the charities were possessed of property to the value of £35,000,000, and an annual income of about £1,500,000. Such was the state of the charities in 1851, when a Bill was brought in by the Whig Government to superintend the charities. It did not propose to construct a Board such as that which now existed. The Commissioners were to superintend the charities, leaving it to the Trustees of each to attend to the charity and administer the funds. That Bill did not become law. In 1852 a like Bill to superintend the charities was brought in by the Earl of Derby's Government, but the Attorney General of that day failed to pass the Bill through Committee. But in 1853 the Whig Government brought in the Bill under which the Board was constituted; and he would read to the House a few extracts from the debates on the measure, for the purpose of showing the pledges given by the Government when they induced Parliament to pass the Bill. When a Government stood before Parliament for the purpose of inducing them to agree to a measure of an important description, the Members of that and the other House listened to the grounds on which the assent of Parliament was solicited. If a Minister stood up and stated distinctly that it was the intention of Government to carry out such and such a course, Parliament credited his word, and the Bill became law. The Whig Government, by their Lord Chancellor, introduced the Bill of 1853, declaring that "the duties of the Board would be to exercise a general superintendence over all the charities of the kingdom at no expense to any." When he (Mr. Ferrand) stated on his Motion for Returns early in the Session, that the funds of some of the charities were being swallowed up by the expenses, the right hon. Gentleman opposition (Mr. Lowe) stood up and declared that the charities were not put to a farthing of expense. The Lord Chancellor went on to say that "the Board was to consist of three Commissioners, one secretary, and two legal gentlemen of high attainments, upon whom, of course, the more laborious part of the business would devolve as Inspectors, who were to go into the country and bring justice home to the doors of the different charities." He also stated that "the total expenses would probably not be more than £5,000 or £6,000 a year, and that it should be paid out of the public exchequer." Was that pledge kept when they found, as he had already stated, that the expense of the Board during the past year amounted to no less than £18,250? In Opposition it was strongly objected that the powers given by the Bill were never contemplated by the Charity Commissioners—no more they were—that up to that time such powers had never before been intrusted to individuals in this country—that it would be a political party Board, and could never possess public confidence. That was the opinion of the two noble Lords who opposed the Bill. The Bill was read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee of the House of Lords. That was early in May, 1853. On August the 2nd, the second reading of the Bill was moved in that House by Lord John Russell. His Lordship stated that the Bill had been introduced into the other House by the Lord Chancellor, and had been referred to a Select Committee. Now, he (Mr. Ferrand) asked the attention of the House while he read to them the Report of that Select Committee, which the Government in both Houses had pledged themselves to abide by when the Board was constituted. It was the opinion of the Committee "That it would be better that the question of general expenditure and administration of charities should be altogether separated from any political question and from the interest of any party."

How had that pledge been kept? It had been distinctly and deliberately broken in every appointment. There was only a single man connected with the Board who was even tinged with Conservative principles. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, but when the word of a Cabinet Minister and a solemn pledge given to the House of Commons were broken, it was no laughing matter to the country. However, it seemed to have been long thought that the word of honour of a Cabinet Minister was worth nothing unless so far as it kept a Government in office. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said the other day that he was constantly receiving letters from householders complaining that they were sold up in order to pay the taxes, and that it made his heart bleed to read them. He would ask hon. Gentlemen opposite who laughed, how many of these poor creatures might not have been sold up in order to raise the £18,250 to pay the expenses of the Commissioners? The noble Lord also said that though three Commissioners were named in the Bill, probably after a time so many would not be required, and he would therefore introduce a clause by which, in 1857, one of the Commissionerships would cease and determine. The removal of that Commissioner would have reduced the expense to about £3,800, since the whole was not to exceed £5,000 or £6,000 according to the Lord Chancellor. These were the statements made in 1853. But a most extraordinary circumstance happened in 1855, in defiance of all those pledges of economy made by the Whig Government to Parliament. They came before the House, and asked for another Act for a further construction of the Board. And now he would refer to proceedings connected with the discussion of that Bill which would create in the minds of hon. Members a grave suspicion that the Bill was nothing in the world but a gross and scandalous job. When he moved for the Returns the other day, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) complained that he used violent language. He was determined when he brought public grievances before the House to use language strong enough to make known what he thought, but not to use any expressions which might be offensive to any one in it. On the 16th of April, 1855, the Lord Chancellor introduced a measure totally different from that of 1853. He entered fully into the details of the measure, and went through clause after clause, explaining the intention of Government. The Bill gave arbitrary and unconstitutional powers to the Board, converting it into a sort of star chamber, and appointed permanently a third Commissioner, whose office was to have expired in 1857. When the Bill was brought into the House of Lords, there was not a clause in it which related to the appointment of additional Inspectors. He asked particular attention to that circumstance, because before he should sit down he should have to make statements which he was prepared to prove before a Select Committee. In the annual Report of the Commissioners, laid upon the table at the commencement of that year, they expressed regret at the death of Mr. Jones, the third Commissioner, who was to retire in 1857, but did not say a word about the appointment of further Inspectors. The Bill was brought into that House on the 2nd of August, but there was no discussion upon it until the 11th, within some ten days of the close of the Session. The Attorney General of the day, Sir Alexander Cockburn, proposed that the second reading should be agreed to without opposition. The hon. Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Knight) strongly objected on account of the centralizing powers of the Bill; but the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary asked him to postpone his objections till the Bill was in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli) said that the objections affected the principle of the Bill, and ought to be discussed upon the second reading. The noble Viscount (Viscount Palmerston) stated that the real object of the Bill was to invest the Commissioners with certain powers which would prevent the necessity for long, expensive, and multiplied Chancery suits. That was the real object according to the noble Lord, but before he sat down he would show the House what the real object was. The House believed the noble Lord, they took his word, there was no discussion, and the second reading took place. Some days afterwards, on the 6th of August, a further discussion took place, on the order of the day for going into the Committee, and the Attorney General said that the salary of one of the Commissioners would drop at the end of the year. Now, that was an untrue statement of the Attorney General. Let the House mark what followed. The Attorney General said—

"It having been found that the present number of the Inspectors was too limited, it was proposed to take powers in the present Bill to add to them."

How had that been found? Who had found that out? The Commons had never found it out. The Lords had never found it out. He would tell the House by-and-bye. The hon. Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Knight) said he "Could not help thinking that an attempt was being made to smuggle the measure through the House."

He gave the hon. Member credit for his acuteness. It was an attempt to smuggle the Bill through the House. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Mr. Cairns) said, that "He hoped the House would not extend the powers of the Commissioners except upon a well matured plan which had been considered by a Select Committee."

The right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley)

"Protested against the unconstitutional powers. The same Law Officers had in the space of two years brought forward entirely distinct and different measures. It would be best to improve the present system and let it work in public, which was the only security. There were three committees sitting in St. James's Square. There might be (he proceeded) three angels sitting in Lincoln's Inn Fields, but if they sat in private the public would not be satisfied. A great many of the charity trustees had been accused of applying the funds to political purposes, and things done in secret conclave would assuredly be suspected. In the present form the measure would tend to swallow up charities."

The Whig Government, after the remarks of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire, saw that their Bill was in danger, and that their gross job for the appointment of Charity Inspectors was about to be lost. And what did they do? They gave up the whole of the clauses which were stated by the noble Lord at the head of the Government to be the real object of the Bill, and a hope was expressed that the House would go into Committee. The House was again humbugged, and the Bill passed through Committee. On the 11th of August the Bill was sent to the House of Lords, and the clause authorizing the three Inspectors was agreed to—probably not half-a-dozen Members being present. The Commissioners were appointed on the 30th October. But when were the Inspectors appointed? Why, those Inspectors who, in August, 1855, it was stated were absolutely necessary for the performance of the duty, were not appointed until eight months afterwards. They were not appointed until the 26th April in the following year, and he would presently inform the House why that delay took place. He would, in the next place, refer to the Board, and hold up to view that snug nest of Whigs. Hon. Members were indebted to him for knowing anything about the interior of the Board, for he had had a hard struggle to wring the Return from the Government. Lord John Russell had said that the Select Committee of the House of Lords were of opinion that it would be better to separate the general administration of charities from any political feeling. However, in October, in 1853, the Board was constituted in the following way:—Peter Erle, Queen's Counsel, Chief Commissioner, with £1,500 a year—a Whig; James Hill, first paid Commissioner, with £1,200 a year—a Whig; R. Jones, with £1,200 a year—a Whig. Now, he had not a word to say against these gentlemen in their private capacity. He understood that all the lawyers who were M.P.'s. had come down to the House to defend Mr. Erle. He believed him to be an honourable man and a perfect gentleman. He had never met Mr. Erle but once, and that was at the Charity Board, and he acknowledged that Mr. Erle was a gentleman of great urbanity; but the question now was, had he done his duty? Mr. Hill, he believed, was an eminent counsel at the time of his appointment, and Mr. Jones was a respectable clergyman, though why a clergyman was placed on the Charity Board he could not conceive, unless it was for being a Whig. Next, there was Henry Morgan Vane, the secretary, with a salary of £800, and there existed a strong opinion in the country that he was neglecting his duty. Then came Mr. Hare, a barrister, with £800, and the last appointed in 1853 was Mr. Skirrow, jun., with £800 a year. From his early boyhood he had known Mr. Skirrow, and he could safely say that he was an honourable man; and he had heard people say that Mr. Skirrow was the working head of the Board, and that if it were not for him the Board would come to a standstill. If these gentlemen had conducted the affairs of the Board properly, the Select Committee he asked for would, no doubt, report so to the House. He then came to the Act of 1855, by which Mr. Campbell, the Queen's Counsel, was appointed a permanent Commissioner with a salary of £1,200 a year, in direct violation of the pledge given to Parliament that the appointment should cease in 1857. With regard to the three Inspectors—the men who were absolutely necessary in August, 1855, but who, nevertheless, were not appointed until April, 1856—he could safely say that it was the general opinion in many parts of the country that Mr. Martin had grossly failed in the performance of his duty. That Mr. Martin had been a partisan, he could say from his own knowledge. Mr. Boase, the second Inspector, was electioneering agent in the previous year to the private Secretary of the present Prime Minister. On a former occasion he had mentioned circumstances connected with that gentleman's conduct to Sir John Trelawny at the election of 1854, which Mr. Boase had never ventured to contradict, though the hon. Member for Liskeard

(Mr. Bernal Osborne) had said that the statement was all wrong. Now, if he had said anything wrong, he would be ready to retract it, but he made the statement on the authority of public letters in the newspapers and other communications. Mr. Boase published a letter in The Times, stating that he had not deserted Sir John Trelawny, but he admitted that he was appointed Inspector because he was electioneering agent to the private Secretary of the Prime Minister. Was that a proper person to be appointed an Inspector in the teeth of Lord John Russell's declaration that the Board was not to be mixed up with party politics? It was openly stated in the West of England that the private Secretary of the noble Lord had paid his election expenses out of that appointment. Now if the House should consent to the appointment of the Committee he believed that circumstances would come out which would prove anything but creditable to the noble Lord. He now came to the third Inspector—Mr. John Simons—who was described by the right hon. Member for Calne, when he last addressed the House on the subject, as “a gentleman who had not been brought up, as far as he knew, to anything.” Did the right hon. Gentleman consider it his duty, as the head of the Charity Board, to ring his bell and say to Mr. John Simons, “I am going down to the House of Commons to oppose the return of the Member for Devonport; he has asked for the professions, trades, and callings of the members of the Board; and I am going to tell the House that the three Commissioners are all eminent men; and with respect to the Inspectors, that three of them are barristers, another is a solicitor—pray what are you?” The right hon. Gentleman told the House that as far as he was aware, Mr. Simons had not been brought up to anything. Now he (Mr. Ferrand) would tell the House who Mr. Simons really was, what he had been, and show how the public taxes were squandered by those Whigs who were so deeply pledged to retrenchment. The gentleman referred to was not Mr. John Simons. He was Mr. John Simons, jun. [Cries of “Oh, oh!”] Hon. Gentleman should not halloo before they were out of the wood. This Mr. John Simons, jun., was an uneducated man; he could write indifferently, but he could not spell. That person was clothed with judicial powers. He had a right to hold a court in any part of England and Wales, to summon before him Peers of the realm,

Mr. Ferrand

Members of this House, the Speaker himself when he left the chair, to administer oaths, to examine and cross-examine. If he thought a witness had not given his evidence satisfactorily he could order that he should be prosecuted for perjury, and if any one failed to attend before him he could have him committed for contempt of Chancery. This man had also the power of examining into Charities of enormous wealth. Now, as he had said, a Charity Inspector ought to be a man of the highest integrity and honour; and, above all, when he had to come in contact with trustees against whom charges were made. Well, this John Simons, jun., was a coal and potato dealer in the Hampstead Road. [A laugh.] There should be no mistake about it. Here was his card. [The hon. Member held up a card.] It was as black as coal, and as dirty as a rotten potato. In fact, it might have lain for twelve months on the floor of a grocer's shop or been nailed to a costermonger's barrow. The card was as follows:—“John Simons, jun., coal merchant, Bridge Wharf, Regent's Canal, Hampstead Road.” In 1853 he was a coal and potato dealer. At the end of the year he fled from his creditors to Australia. While there he was reduced to beggary, and worked as a hired labourer. In July, 1855, Mr. Wood, the chairman of the Inland Revenue Board, was dangerously ill. It was intended that John Simons, jun., should be appointed in his place with a salary of £2,000 a year. But Mr. Wood did not then die, and Sir George Coruwall Lewis was Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr. Wood lived till the October of the following year. Therefore it was decided that the coal and potato dealer should be provided for by the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, which was then before Parliament, and a place was secured for him as a third Charity Inspector, with a salary of £800 a year. The Act received the Royal Assent on the 14th of August. John Simons, jun., was immediately written to, and desired to come home, “for a lucrative Government office had been provided for him by one of the highest in the land.” He arrived in England early in 1856, and had to undergo two months' preparation before his friends dared to let him enter the office of the Charity Board. He was then recommended to Her Majesty as duly qualified, and appointed by the Queen on the 21st April, all three appointments of Inspectors having been kept vacant for eight months until he returned to England and was prepared, although the Attorney General had declared, on the 6th August in the preceding year, that their immediate appointment was absolutely necessary for the administration of the law. Now, he had written down all these facts in order, if the House desired it, that the document might be laid on the table and sent to the Select Committee, before which he was prepared to substantiate every word of it. One of this Charity Inspector's creditors, to whom he owed £2,800, which he had received as his agent, heard of his return to England and his lucrative appointment. The gentleman to whom he referred was one of the most eminent members of the Coal Exchange, and a person of the highest honour and integrity, and he was ready to go before the Select Committee, if it were appointed, and make good every word in the paper with which his name was connected. He was quite prepared to give his name to the House if any one asked for it, or to mention it to any Member who chose to ask him for it after he sat down. The gentleman was not afraid of his name being known. Perhaps some Member of the Government might say "Name him!" If so, he would do it at once. Knowing the character of the new Inspector and his unfitness, the gentleman could not credit the announcement he had seen. He would as soon have expected a costermonger to be appointed. He went to the office in St. James's Square, and to his amazement there was his runaway debtor. He demanded his money. The Inspector pleaded poverty and hard pressure from others. He declared he was living in 8s. a week lodgings. His creditor found out that he was living in a large, well-furnished house. In 1857 he was sued for this debt, and this Charity Inspector, with a salary of £800 a year, who was described by the right hon. Member for Calne as amongst the most industrious, honourable, and valuable of Her Majesty's public servants, pleaded the Statute of Limitations, and defrauded his creditor. On the 24th June, 1859, the present Prime Minister was gazetted First Lord of the Treasury, and on the following day the Hampstead Road coal and potato dealer, the runaway fraudulent debtor, the Australian day labourer, the uneducated Charity Inspector, the Statute of Limitations pleader, was presented to Her Majesty by Viscount Palmerston, who stood by and witnessed this insult to his Sovereign. Mark what followed! This corrupt appointment was connected with a scandalous transaction in which a Cabinet Minister was deeply implicated. He was prepared to name him. Did any one ask it? ["Name him!"] It was the noble Viscount opposite who was concerned in this affair, for which the taxpayers had already been plundered of £6,000, and were now paying £800 a year. As he had said, he was prepared to put the paper from which he had read these things on the table, if any one would take the necessary steps to have it laid there. It would then become a Parliamentary paper to which his name was pledged, and if he did not prove its truth in all its material bearings he was unworthy of a seat in the House. Where was the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had taunted them across the floor with being spendthrifts of the public money? Why was he not present sitting on the Treasury Bench and looking at the noble Lord, instead of at the Benches opposite? If the right hon. Gentleman had been present he should have told him that it was his duty, as guardian of the national exchequer, to summon a meeting of the Cabinet for the following day, to insist upon a distinct, a positive, a truthful statement from the noble Lord of all the facts connected with that gross, this odious, this iniquitous appointment; and if he spoke the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, the next day's sun would set upon a broken-up Cabinet and a dissolved Ministry; or if the Chancellor of the Exchequer remained in office after he had heard all the circumstances connected with this affair, his character as a public man in England would be gone, he would be unworthy of his office, and he would fall into the deepest pit of degradation and debasement by continuing a member of a Ministry at the head of which was the noble Lord. He had understood his Motion was to be opposed. It could not be opposed now without the Government suffering an ignominious defeat. If they attempted to divide the House he would appeal to the financial reformers who sat below the gangway, whether he had not made out a case already (and he could say much more) for an inquiry by a Select Committee. He had done with the appointments of 1855. He trusted he had convinced the House what was the reason why the three Inspectors were not appointed till April, 1856, when John Simons, jun., got his place. He would go to the other appointments. There was Mr. Good, the chief clerk, who was a Whig, with £660 a year. The next appointment involved a violation of the law. There was no authority whatever to establish an accountant. The Act said there should be Commissioners, Inspectors, Clerks, and Messengers; but there was not a word about any Accountant. Not long ago he heard it said that some one suspected of a tinge of Conservatism had got into that nest of Whigs, and had made the nest very uncomfortable. He feared they had quickly inoculated the intruder; and, at any rate, it could not be this person for whom the snug berth of accountant was provided. He entered office with a salary of £300, which was raised in the next year to £400, which was now £550, and which was every year increasing, so that he did not know where it would stop. Who did the House suppose got that snug appointment contrary to law? William Goodenough Hayter; not the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wells, but his nephew. Now, was not that, he would ask, too bad for a retrenchment Government? Was it not a job, and a job of which nothing would have been known had he not made a violent speech on the 12th of February? Next came the first clerk, T. W. Erle, who, he supposed, was a son of Peter. That, however, was not all. Another office had been created in direct violation of the law, that of Record keeper. There was no such appointment mentioned in the Act of Parliament. The salary was £332 per annum. The office was held by E. K. Greville, who he was told was a Whig, and he had no doubt of it. After that came eight first-class clerks, eleven second-class clerks, and nine third-class clerks, making twenty-eight altogether—two-thirds of the appointments being gross jobs. He would next advert to the expenses of the Board, which had gone on increasing, until they in the present year amounted to £18,243, though a pledge had been given on the part of the Government that they should not exceed £5,000 or £6,000. Of the £18,243 the sum of £7,060 was for appointments made by the Commissioners and the Whig patronage Lord of the Treasury, while the third Commissioner being made permanent by the Act of 1855, had cost the ratepayers of the country £8,400, and the additional three jobbed Inspectors at the rate of £3,600 annually. The total expense of the present Board already amounted, he might add, to £181,224; the expense of the Commissioners before the Board to £315,690, the entire cost, not including the printing of thirty-eight close folio volumes and other Parliamentary papers, being thus £496,914. That being the expenditure of the Board, he was anxious, as briefly as he could, to show what had been the working of the Board. Let it be borne in mind that the Inspectors were to be the working power of the Board. They were to go through the country, to visit the different Charities, and bring justice to the doors of the people in every part of England and Wales. On the 14th of August, 1854, the first annual Report of the Commissioners was placed upon the table of that House. It was then stated that they had distributed 15,000 circulars previous to the 31st December, and that there were thirty or forty cases in which their advice and assistance had been asked. There was no statement that the Inspectors had visited one. In their second Report, in 1855, they stated that there were 1,100 special applications. The Inspectors investigated the circumstances of about 800. That was the only time in which the numbers were mentioned. In 1856 the Report stated that there were 864 applications. It did not mention the number of charities inspected, but said "very numerous." They said they anticipated great advantage from trustees being obliged to submit parochial charities to public audit in the vestries. In 1857 the Report stated that there were 1,007 particular cases. They said the Inspectors had "proceeded with the investigation of charities in various localities." They were getting fine by degrees and beautifully less with their information. According to the fifth annual Report there were 948 special applications. The Commissioners said that

"The investigation of charities has been actively proceeded with by the Inspectors under our direction in those places where such an investigation has appeared to be most requisite."

That was the last Report in which the Inspectors were mentioned until 1864, after he had given notice of his intention to bring their conduct before the House. A Report was soon laid on the table, on the 26th of April, in which it was stated that "They have been actively engaged under our direction in investigating the circumstances of various foundations, particularly several important charities in and near the metropolis."

He had taken considerable pains to find out what they had been doing, and in the Return he had moved for he asked for a statement of their travelling expenses. He found from that Return that the annual average expenses of Mr. Hare for travelling through the country to carry justice to the doors of the different charities of England were £71 0s. 8d., being a weekly average of £1 7s. 6d. In speaking of Mr. Skirrow, he must say that he remained very much at the Charity Board, and that he was a most useful and able man. His annual average was £60 12s., or a weekly average of £1 3s. 6d. Now he came to Mr. F. O. Martin, whose appointment he believed to be a gross job. He had the evidence in his possession, but he would not disclose it lest the result might be to defeat the ends of justice. His annual average was £95. or £1 16s. 8d. weekly. He now came to the coal and potato dealer. In 1856 this man's travelling expenses amounted to £22 5s.; in the following year the sum was £12 17s. 4d.; in 1858 it was £12 18s.; and in 1859, when he was presented at Court, the amount rose to £71 13s. 7d. Whether his Court dress was paid for in the sum he could not say; but it was an extraordinary circumstance that this man's travelling expenses amounted in 1859 to £71 13s. 7d., and in the following year should drop down to £12 12s. 10d. In 1861 his expenses were £21 4s. 3d.; in 1862 the amount was £36 13s. 7d.; in 1863 the sum was £57 3s. The annual average was £32 1s. 5d., or a weekly average of 12s. 8d. The annual average of Mr. Boase was £20 6s. 8d., or 8s. a week. These were the members of that Board, who were described by the right hon. Member for Calne, the unpaid Commissioner, as among the most industrious, the most valuable, and the most honourable of Her Majesty's servants. Well, the last three of them had received £6,000 each, £2,400 a year wrung from the poor taxpayers of this country by a Chancellor of the Exchequer, who did not hesitate to say that it made his heart bleed when he was asked for 5d. a day to be added to the pay of a warrant officer in the Royal Navy. He had now given the House some notion of the working of the Board, but he must trespass a little longer upon their attention, because it was an important question. There were no less than forty-seven men upon their trial in that charity office; and it was the duty of a man bringing charges against them to make out his case. Now, he had said that Mr. Martin, one of the Inspectors, had of his own knowledge acted most improperly, and, he might say, most dishonestly. He (Mr. Ferrand) went to the Charity Board in 1857, and made a statement with reference to a charity at Bingley, to Mr. Erle, who at once told him that the subject of his communication was an important matter, and that he had found, according to documents in the office, that there was something seriously wrong. He said further that he would order an Inspector to go down and make an inquiry into the charities. Mr. Martin went down and held a court. On the first day nothing could be more fair and impartial, and he would add more able, than the manner in which he conducted that inquiry. He (Mr. Ferrand) went home, and during the evening he received information that Mr. Martin had been got at by the Whigs. He (Mr. Ferrand) would not believe the report, because he had acted in so fair and impartial a manner hitherto; but he was told that he had better employ a solicitor. Next morning Mr. Martin showed a temper which was something extraordinary. He conducted himself in an overbearing, insolent, and violent manner. He bullied the witnesses, refused their evidence, and gave great dissatisfaction. He went away from that meeting back to London, and did not send in a Report for a considerable length of time. Things were still going on from bad to worse in connection with these charities. He (Mr. Ferrand) wrote repeated letters to the Charity Commissioners, told them how the property was being jobbed away, and called upon them to interfere to take steps to recover the property, which a trustee admitted he had taken and put into his own pocket. They never replied to his letter. At last the trustee in question died. He would not refer to the cause of his death, or the circumstances that surrounded the event, but he wrote to the Commissioners and told them that the man was dead, and that he had not paid the money which he owed to the charity trust. He had repeatedly reminded them of his defalcations, and that he was overwhelmed in debt, but they never answered his letters. At last he wrote a full account of the whole circumstances, and told the Commissioners that they had treated him in the most offensive manner, and that if they did not acknowledge the receipt of his letter, he would send a copy of it to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department. The House should hear the answer he got—“Sir, I am to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 15th inst.” That was all the reply he got. He went to London and saw the hon. Member for Leeds, and asked him to move for the whole correspondence in connection with the charity trust at Bingley. His hon. Friend went to the Home Secretary and asked for these papers, and the answer of the right hon. Baronet was, "of course you shall have them." But he (Mr. Ferrand) believed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne communicated with the Home Secretary, and they were not allowed to be produced. But what did the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne say to the hon. Member for Leeds? Why that he (Mr. Ferrand), who had been vilified by Mr. Martin's false report—who had been struggling to save the charities in his neighbourhood from ruin—had been in the right, and the Charity Commissioners had been in the wrong, and the Government were about to bring in a Bill to put a stop to the frauds of which he had for years complained. What had taken place since that man's death? They had in the parish one of the best and most faithful ministers of the Gospel. He had been trying to rescue these trust funds; but at last the letters of the Commissioners became so offensive that the trustees said they would in a body resign. Since he (Mr. Ferrand) had given his notice, however, the Commissioners became as civil and attentive as possible, and there was nothing in the world they would not do. He now came to Giggleswick School, a question in which the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Morrison) had taken a great deal of interest. There was considerable difference of opinion as to the proceedings of the Charity Commissioners; but the great body of the public were of opinion that the Commissioners had grossly neglected their duty. Recollect that by the law of the land they had tied the hands behind the back of every trustee in England. They had no power to act without the consent of the Commissioners, who would not move, and nobody else could move. Mr. Foster had written a pamphlet in which he made serious charges against the Commissioners. He stated that the Report of one of the Inspectors contained several errors, and one statement entirely false, and that it was a gross misrepresentation of facts. The Leeds Intelligencer, the Lancaster Guardian, the Lancaster Gazette, and the Manchester Guardian, more or less endorsed Mr. Foster's views. The Bradford Observer, also a Whig paper, said that the inquiry of Mr. Martin was a mere mockery, and that the dereliction of duty on the part of the Charity Commissioners ought to be brought under the notice of the House of Commons by the West Riding Members. An application was made to the Commissioners for an inquiry into a charity at Richmond. The letter was dated 19th August, 1863. The reply was that the application would be submitted to the Commissioners as soon as possible, the meetings of the Board having been suspended during the recess. On the 5th February following the parties had never heard a word. The recess of the Commissioners was a long one. He wished to say a few words about Totnes, the Duke of Somerset's borough. There the charitable estates were valuable. The four acting trustees were Whigs. Mr. Seymour's political agent was one, and the clerk was Mr. Pender's paid agent. No accounts had been rendered by the trustees for seven years. Hundreds of pounds had been kept in the hands of the clerk which ought to have been invested. The Commissioners had been constantly appealed to, but although the first letter was dated the 8th of January, 1860, and they were constantly pressed to send an Inspector, they had made the most paltry and shuffling excuses. It was only in March last, after he had moved for the Return of the travelling expenses, that they sent one. It was notorious that the Duke of Somerset had for two or three years acted in the most tyrannical manner in the borough of Totnes. He had sold the electors up—he had driven them from their holdings by scores, because they desired to enforce the bargain which he had entered into with them, that they should elect one member and he the other. Under those circumstances it was natural that party and political feeling should run high in the borough, and it therefore was of the greatest importance that the Commissioners should have selected a perfectly impartial, upright, and honourable Inspector to inquire into the management of the charities with which the Whigs were so scandalously mixed up. Whom did they send? Mr. Boase, the electioneering agent of the private Secretary of the noble Lord, the Colleague of the Duke of Somerset. That was a scandalous act on the part of the Commissioners. What was the result? Of course Mr. Boase would do his best to serve his patrons. He had received a letter from Totnes, dated March 25, 1864, the writer of which said, "They have sent an Inspector about twelve months after they promised to do so, and, indeed, he is a Radical. Of course he was sent to patch up the Radical misdoings. Although the clerk of the trustees kept hundreds of pounds, contrary to the scheme, Mr. Boase smiled at it, and made it appear as if nothing. The Conservatives are very much disgusted with Mr. Boase." The case of Huntingdon contradicted the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, no doubt in perfect good faith, that the Charity Commissioners had nothing to do with taking money from the charities of the country. A letter dated Huntingdon, March, 1864, contained the following account of the dealings with the charities of that place:—

"Sir,—Having seen that you are about to bring forward a Motion upon the subject of the Charity Commission, and supposing that you might not object to have facts with regard to it brought under your notice, I take the liberty of writing to acquaint you with the operations of the Charity Commission in respect to the municipal charities of this town. Several years ago returns were made to the Commissioners of the incomes and working of the several charities. Although there was no fault to be found with the application of the funds, which, in most cases, was made as nearly conformable as possible with the wills of the founders, a new scheme was to be put forth, and new trustees appointed. This scheme has been, to my knowledge, upwards of five years in preparation. I was, in the early stage of it, directed by the Commissioners to apply for information upon it to Messrs. Fearon and Clabon, solicitors to the Attorney General, and in their hands I found the matter remained for the best part of the period I have named. On one occasion Mr. Clabon visited Huntingdon with a view of finding out the wishes of the chief inhabitants with regard to their charities, and after one rather hurried meeting he embodied most of the suggestions then made in the scheme, which, after further and needless delay, was printed and came into operation for the first time at Easter, 1863. The results of this 'investigation' are that we have a body of sixteen trustees to manage charities which could much more effectively be administered by six. We have a scheme differing from the former mode of management in very few particulars, and those only such as we suggested ourselves, and now are not able to alter if it should from time to time need improvement. And out of charities which yield an annual income of £471 11s. 6d., of which every penny ought to be paid in education and charitable bequests, we have two bills to pay for 'costs attending this investigation' and schemes—one to Messrs. Fearon and Clabon of £274 13s. 11d.; the other to the town clerk of £255 12s. 6d., making a total of £530 6s. 6d. To meet these expenses we have had to sell stock to the amount of £290 belonging to the charities; and thus, for the sake of 'an investigation,' to cripple our means of carrying out the intentions of those who left their money to feed, clothe, and educate the poor, and not to enrich lawyers or make jobs for a Government Department.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your obedient Servant,

"F. GERALD VANEY, M.A.,

"Rector of All Saints and St. John's,

"Huntingdon."

Now, the statement in that letter completely contradicted what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. Ferrand) assured the House that he had taken up the matter from no other motive than to protect the charities of England from being robbed and plundered, and to show the scandalous manner in which a body whom they paid at the rate of £18,000 a year had failed to do its duty. Let the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bruce) go to a division, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer desires to show himself a faithful guardian of the public purse, he must go into the lobby with him (Mr. Ferrand), for he well knew that if he were to bring forward that tax of £18,000 as a single Vote, no independent Member would support it, and the right hon. Gentleman would not dare to enforce it, as he had no right to take this £18,000, and impose a burden on the public for the purpose of managing these private charities. What would be said if they were to bring in a Bill to authorize the collection of their own rents out of the public taxes? Would the people of this country submit to it? And if not, why should they be made to pay the Charity Commissioners? No single interest had a right to fix an impost upon the country for its individual benefit; and if the charities required a Board to control them, the Charity Estates ought to bear the cost. In that view he was borne out by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Early in the Session he asked the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, why an increase of £200 a year salary had been given to the Secretary, and the right hon. Gentleman justified the addition, stating that this increase had been recommended by Sir G. C. Lewis and agreed to by the House. It was rather a tart reply, and financial reformers laughed, thinking that the right hon. Gentleman had given him a knock-down answer. It now appeared that the proposal for an increase of salary was made on the 21st of August, 1860, when most hon. Members had left town for the country, and there were only fifty-four present. The Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed to the Vote, but the right hon. Gentleman felt that he was in the wrong, and he (Mr. Ferrand) knew he did, and the reason that he knew this was, that when the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), anxious to do good service to the barristers who acted as Inspectors, and finding that the increase to the Secretary was unanimously agreed to, drew attention to the duties which were discharged by the Inspectors, and suggested that an increase should be made to their salaries; the Chancellor of the Exchequer declined to accede to any increase of salary which might be given to the Inspectors out of the Consolidated Fund. He said that he did not think that the public purse should be charged for such purposes. And the Attorney General said that there ought to be a clause proposed to give compensation to the Inspectors to a limited amount, such compensation to be raised out of the trust funds committed to their charge. The difference was that the suggestion as to the Inspectors came from below the gangway, and not from any recognized Member of the Whig party. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), whose wisdom was shown on all occasions that he rose to address the House, suggested that the whole subject of expenditure should be brought forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the following Session. As that right hon. Gentleman had never since complied with the suggestion, he had discharged the duty for him. He regretted the right hon. Gentleman had not been present during the greater portion of his remarks, as he had felt it necessary to make frequent reference to him. He thought he had made out a strong case, and he thanked the House for the patience with which they had listened to him. The House must feel that the truth of the allegations which he had made ought to be inquired into before a Select Committee, and if the Government, defended by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bruce), wished to be considered honest and straightforward, and if he himself (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) desired to be thought a consistent, watchful guardian of the public purse, they were bound to go into the lobby with him. He had that night exposed a state of things disgraceful to the Whigs as a Government; there could be no denying it; and that feeling would be expressed unmistakably out of doors if the noble Lord should think proper to appeal to the country as the only man able to govern it. Let him go down to Tiverton and stand upon the hustings with John Simons junior's trade card in his hand; let him tell the electors of Tiverton that was his ticket; that such was the way in which his retrenching and reforming Government guarded the taxes of the country; that such was the fashion in which he selected public officers to perform grave and important duties, and that such was the manner he insulted the Sovereign. And would those hon. Members who sat behind him, propping with their knees a tottering Government, dare on the hustings to justify the appointment of Mr. John Simons? Would they go on the hustings and declare that the noble Lord was the only man fit to govern this country? If they did, a million voices would meet them with the cry, "How about John Simons, junior?" One word he felt bound to say to the financial reformers. If they approved appointments such as he had described, the jobbing he had exposed—the robbery of the public taxpayers, they must, if the Government dared to divide against the Motion, go into the lobby for its rejection. If, on the other hand, they supported the demand for inquiry, they would be doing their duty to their constituents and acting as faithful representatives. He had now to say a word to those sitting on his own side of the House. They were not afraid to go to the country. They did not think the noble Lord the only man able to govern England; they were prepared for the conflict at any moment. As long as the Conservative party existed in England, there would not be a man among them who would not rather die a thousand deaths than be a party to such transactions as he had endeavoured to expose. The hon. Member concluded by moving for a Select Committee.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the construction, the expense, and the working of the Board of Charity Commissioners,"—(Mr. Ferrand.)

—instead thereof.

MR. MORRISON said, that as the Giggleswick School had been referred to by the hon. Gentleman, it was only an act of justice to the Commissioners to state that, having had every opportunity of witnessing their action as regarded that school, he thought they were entirely free from blame. For three years past they had taken the greatest pains, and had sent down scheme after scheme which had fallen to the ground—as such plans frequently failed—in consequence of the opposition of those who lived in the immediate neighbourhood of the school. If the hon. Gentleman's Motion had been for an inquiry into the working of the Commission, he should have had much pleasure in voting with him, because he could not help thinking that the waste of money in connection with the public charities scattered through the country deserved the serious consideration of the House. He trusted that Government would supplement the good work they had done in regard to the Universities and public schools by an inquiry respecting the charities. The speech of the hon. Member, however, had from first to last been a personal attack upon the private character of the Charity Commissioners, and as he believed they had performed their duties in a manner to give general satisfaction, he was unable to go into the lobby with the hon. Gentleman.

MR. F. S. POWELL said that, as a Member of the Bingley Trust, he rose for himself and colleagues to enter a strong and emphatic protest against the charge made by his hon. Friend, that they had been guilty, as trustees, of jobbing away the property intrusted to them.

MR. FERRAND: I made no charge against the hon. Member.

MR. F. S. POWELL: The hon. Member says he did not bring the charge, and if the charge be withdrawn a reply to it is unnecessary.

MR. FERRAND: My remarks had reference to the charity before my hon. Friend was a trustee.

MR. F. S. POWELL said, that Mr. Martin came down from London after he was a trustee, and he was a party to the proceedings. In one particular case, the charge against the trustees was that they had sold, or were prepared to sell, a plot of land below its value. As a trustee he felt bound with a great responsibility, and he had brought over from Bradford, at his own expense, two surveyors, unconnected both with the trustees and the purchaser, and they both declared that the sale was an advantageous one for the trust. If the arrangements made for selling that property were thoroughly investigated, it would be found that a wise discretion had been exercised, and that the charity would be largely benefited by it. He hoped that the Government would grant the inquiry. If he were one of the Commissioners against whom such charges were made, he should be anxious for a full and complete inquiry, so as to give the hon. Member an opportunity of proving his allegations, and the Commissioners an opportunity of answering and rebutting the accusations made against them. He believed it was for the benefit of the public service that frequent inquiry should be made by the House into the operations and mode of proceeding of public Boards. Such inquiries usually worked a marvellous change. The secretary, who probably had been pert, became civil; the letters, instead of being formal, and merely acknowledging the receipt of communications, went into detail, and condescended to give a civil answer to inquiries, and business was transacted, instead of being postponed or neglected. The Charity Commissioners were invested with large powers, and they ought to treat the trustees with generosity, courtesy, and confidence. If they were not so dealt with, an inferior class of men would be left to discharge the duties, and the business of the charities would be directed by the red tape of a London office, and not under the watchful eye of local trustees.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he could assure the House that if the tone and language of the hon. Gentleman had been such that the Government could accede to his Motion, they would gladly have done so. In 1860 very large and new powers had been given to the Commissioners, and there could be no more legitimate subject of inquiry than whether those powers had been exercised for the public good, and whether they might be further extended for the public advantage. Had that been the object of the hon. Gentleman, and had his speech been consistent with that object, the utmost that could have been said was that the Session being so far advanced the time was not propitious for an inquiry, which must necessarily be an extended one, but that the subject deserved attention; and, speaking on the part of the Government, he might have given the hon. Gentleman the assurance that the Committee for which he asked should be appointed at the beginning of the next Session. But the speech of the hon. Gentleman had not been directed to the real substantial merits of the question—namely, whether or not the powers intrusted to the Commissioners had been exercised for the public good. From first to last the speech of the hon. Gentleman had been a personal attack against the members constituting the Board and their subordinates. From the highest to the lowest none had escaped his personal invective. The character of the Commissioners was too well known to the large majority of Members of that House to need any defence from him.

They were men of well-known ability, integrity, and industry. Many hon. Members must have had frequent opportunities of consulting them, and he was sure that many hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House would be anxious to bear testimony to their ability, integrity, and worth. But what would the House, consisting of honourable men, say to charges against persons of comparative obscurity without any previous announcement to him who was their legitimate defender? It was bad enough that, when he (Mr. Bruce) who had been appointed fourth Commissioner, and was therefore their official defender, had only just stepped into that office, the hon. Gentleman had not told him what were the cases he intended to bring before the House, so as to enable him to inquire what answer could be made to these charges. But even that was a trifling offence as compared with that of making, without notice, a violent and personal attack against the character of officials. The House had heard what the hon. Gentleman had said of the character of Mr. John Simons. He (Mr. Bruce) knew nothing of Mr. John Simons' antecedents before he entered the office; and he was, therefore, unable to contradict or explain any of the hon. Gentleman's statements respecting his early career; but he had been informed that that gentleman had performed the duties intrusted to him in a satisfactory manner, and was it right or just, therefore, to rake up his past history? because the House would observe there was no imputation of misconduct on the part of Mr. John Simons since his appointment. The hon. Gentleman had made an attack upon Mr. Martin, but he had not sat down for one moment before direct contradictions were given to two of the statements affecting that gentleman. The House was told that it would not be properly doing its duty if it did not grant a Committee to inquire into charges which an hon. Gentleman might make rashly and recklessly, as those charges had been made. The Government could not accede to a proposition made in that spirit. Fortunately, he was not called upon to defend a body of men who were under the ban of public opinion; on the contrary, he had merely to share with others the easy task of defending men who stood high in the respect and esteem of those who knew them. To proceed to the merits of the case apart from the personal attack. The hon. Gentleman called attention to the immense expense of inquiry. It might possibly be true, for he had not had an opportunity of examining the subject, that before the Commissioners were appointed upwards of £300,000 had been spent in various Commissions of Inquiry. But these Commissions were appointed for the purpose of inquiring how many charities there were, and the facts relating to them. They had nothing to do with the administration of the charities. But, said the hon. Gentleman, the Commissioners commenced with an expenditure of £5,000 or £6,000 a year, and they have reached £18,000. True; but the ordinary business of the Board had increased enormously, new branches of business, entirely unlooked for when the Commission was established, had arisen or been created by Act of Parliament; and the amount of work done, when compared with the expense, was not threefold, but tenfold. In 1837 the number of charities was stated to be 28,000. By the lapse of time and the inquiries of the Commissioners that number had been raised to something like 50,000. At that time no payments by trustees of charities were made to the Commissioners; no accounts were dealt with by them; but gradually, from 1854 to the present time, a sum of nearly £2,000,000 had been paid into their hands in no less than 3,000 separate accounts, the keeping of which required a large staff of clerks and that accountant, of whom the hon. Gentleman had made such strong complaints. But there were other strong facts connected with the case. Since 1855, when the Treasury inquired into the constitution of the Board, and fixed their numbers and salaries, the business had increased enormously, but there had been no increase in the number of officers, or in the amount of their salaries, except that ordinary increment to which every person who entered the Civil Service was entitled. But he would say broadly that, while some £2,000,000 had been dealt with by those gentlemen, while their business had vastly increased and their powers had been greatly enlarged, neither their numbers nor their salaries had been increased. For himself he was only too glad that he had supported the passing of the Act of 1860, and he envied his right hon. Friend and predecessor (Mr. Lowe) the credit which he deserved for having introduced it. The effect of the Act was this—that whereas before the Commissioners had no judicial power, but only the power of inquiry and of preventing improper litigation, they then obtained powers which were previously exercised by the County Courts and the Court of Chancery. Whenever a majority of the trustees applied to the Commissioners they were armed by the Act with the same powers as the Court of Chancery possessed; but their immediate and absolute powers extended only to charities which did not exceed £50 a year. In addition to their labours in other respects the Commissioners had, during the three years since the passing of the Act of 1860, inquired judicially into no less than 838 cases, which was an average of one a day. They had done all that work which before was thrown into the County Courts and the Court of Chancery. In reply to the complaint of the hon. Gentleman of the expensiveness of this tribunal, he would meet it with a flat denial, and affirm that there was no expense incurred by charities coming before those Commissioners; they paid no fees or other charges, except the unavoidable expense of the journey that might have to be made to attend the Commission. But what was the case before that power had been given to the Commissioners? Many hon. Gentlemen had heard of the Ludlow Charity suit, in which the expenses had amounted to £20,229; and there were other cases in which enormous costs had been incurred, in the Court of Chancery, the only Court then competent to deal with them, but which might have been decided by the Commissioners without any expense whatever. The best proof of that might be found in what had taken place within a short period. A pamphlet had been sent to him by Mr. Falconer, a County Court Judge, much respected in the district from which he (Mr. Bruce) came. It appeared there had been an inquiry into a charity at Usk, upon the result of which Mr. Falconer delivered an address at the grammar school. The House would remember that Mr. Offley Martin was one of the gentlemen who had been so bitterly attacked by the hon. Gentleman. Of that gentleman and the mode of conducting the inquiry Mr. Falconer said—

“Mr. Offley Martin was sent down as an Inspector. He had evidence publicly given him of the state of the charity, and himself visited the almshouses and inspected part of the estates. Any person who desired to say anything to him was fully heard. Finally a scheme was passed, and this scheme, and all the proceedings connected with it, did not cost the charity one single farthing. If we had been compelled, as we certainly should have been but for the existence of this Board, to go into the Court of Chancery, the cost would have been very great, and the income of the charities would have been greatly crippled. Many of those persons whose opinions it was so satisfactory to us all to hear, and who were heard by the Inspector without interruption, would have been excluded from a hearing in the Court of Chancery. They had themselves the same advantage as if they had been parties to a cause. Every person was content to know that nothing which could instruct or inform the Commissioners was excluded. The decision finally arrived at was made with the advantage of that skill and knowledge which the administration of charities had given to the Commissioners.”

As to this case, Mr. Falconer spoke from his own experience. With respect to the power exercised by the Charity Commissioners, with whom, as he was informed, Mr. Falconer had no acquaintance whatever, he said—

“Those who attack the Board and call its proceedings secret can know little of its acts. Every scheme it proposes is fully made known and published, and full opportunity is given to object to any part of it before it is established. We had meetings at Usk to criticize our proposed scheme, and it had been sent down to be made publicly known and for the purpose of inviting objections to it. If the scheme had been in the Court of Chancery it would have been kept in chambers, and who could have been heard against it, or by whom would the costs of an opposition have been payable? There is far more publicity and efficient responsibility attached to the proceedings of the Board of Charity Commissioners than can by any possibility be connected with proceedings in the Court of Chancery. Any person who will, even unfairly, undertake to examine the subject, will be compelled to conclude that the institution of the Board was the most important, useful, and economical measure to secure the preservation and due administration of charity funds, and for the supervision of Trustees which could have been devised. Its aid and assistance are sought for on all sides. Was the aid of the Court of Chancery ever so sought after? It cannot be imagined that the extravagant, improvident, and—remembering the good which might have been done—the almost wicked schemes relating to certain great charities sanctioned by the Court of Chancery, and mentioned by Mr. Cumin in the fourth volume of the Education Commission Report, 1861, would have been listened to by the Board of Charity Commissioners.”

That was the best answer to the allegation that there was no publicity. How could there possibly be more publicity than was secured by the local inquiry made by the Commissioner after due notice, after inviting the evidence of all parties interested, and all competent witnesses, without any strict regard to their locus standi? He was so satisfied that an inquiry would only redound to the honour of the Commissioners, and lead to the extension of the powers which they exercised so advantageously for the charities, that he should have been glad to assent to the Motion, had it been made with common decency or with the smallest sense of justice. But when imputations were so lavishly cast upon the characters of honourable men without giving them an opportunity of meeting them, he thought it only consistent with a sense of right and justice and the respect due to the House to refuse to accede to a Motion which, however right in itself, had been made under circumstances such as he had described. He hoped, then, the House would reject the Motion, and by so doing pass a censure upon the manner in which the hon. Gentleman sought to obtain what ought to be a judicial inquiry.

Mr. MONTAGUE SMITH said, it was no part of his duty to defend a Whig Government, or the appointments which in the natural order of things may have been made of gentlemen of Whig politics, but knowing the Commissioners whose characters had been so freely assailed by his hon. Friend, he felt bound to rise and declare his belief that the charges made against them were utterly unfounded. The noble Lord, who was at the head of the Government when the Commissioners were appointed, made the appointments, he believed, only in reference to the ability and integrity of those who were selected. As far as Mr. Erle, the Chief Commissioner, whom he had known for many years, was concerned, he was satisfied that a more honourable, just, and conscientious man did not exist. If he had any politics at all, they were of the mildest character, and he certainly would not allow any tinge of political feelings to enter into his decisions. His hon. Friend, who made the present Motion, had spoken of the inundation of anonymous letters he had received containing complaints against the Commissioners. It should be borne in mind that the Commissioners in the exercise of their jurisdiction must disappoint a great number of persons, against whom decisions were given. They had to consider most delicate questions, involving matters of great personal feeling, and it was natural that those against whom they decided should feel some disappointment, and no doubt his hon. Friend had been the recipient of the expression of their disappointment. There was, however, one fact which weighed more in his mind than a thousand letters of complaints which his hon. Friend might have received. A very great alteration in the duties and addition to the labours of the Commissioners had been caused by the Act of 1860, prior to which all they could do was to suggest schemes for the Court of Chancery, but they had no power to make orders that the schemes should be carried into effect. In 1860, however, power was conferred on them to make orders and frame new schemes for the regulation of charities. Ample opportunity for appeal was given to any persons dissatisfied with the schemes, and yet since 1860, though the Commissioners had made 900 orders to establish new schemes for the regulation of charities, not a single appeal had been lodged against them. Could there be a more urgent fact, or one showing in a stronger light the admirable manner in which the Commissioners performed their business? In respect of what court of justice, either of law or equity, would such an event have occurred? His hon. Friend complained of some delay on the part of the Commissioners, but the fact was that they were overwhelmed with work, and since the Act of 1860 the public had gone to them in such numbers that their hands were full. A Return which had been laid before the House showed that, whereas the Court of Chancery in each of the years since 1860 had scarcely made any orders at all to establish schemes for the regulation of charities, the Commissioners had made a vast number. In 1861 the Court of Chancery made 18 orders, the County Courts 7, and these maligned Commissioners 207. In 1862 the Court of Chancery made 32 orders, the County Courts 1, and the Commissioners 281. In 1863 the Court of Chancery made 30, the County Courts 1, and the Commissioners 351. All that business was in addition to the very important matters which they had to transact and determine before. They had also had the important and delicate duty to discharge of appointing new trustees; and in the borough he had the honour to represent they settled a list only a short time ago, which was as free from party and political feeling as possible, and which gave satisfaction to all persons in the town, of all shades of political opinion. With these great and new duties to perform, how was it possible that the Commissioners could avoid allowing some cases to get in arrear? His hon. Friend, in speaking of the Commissioners, allowed that they possessed the attributes of gentlemen; but he (Mr.

M. Smith) could not understand how, at the same time that he made that avowal, his hon. Friend could charge them with gross dereliction of duty, for, as gentlemen and men of honour, they were bound to discharge their duties to the best of their ability. Certainly, he believed no man could bring greater attention and knowledge of his profession to bear upon his duties than Mr. Erle. On the part of Mr. Erle he would not have the least objection to agree to the appointment of the Select Committee, if it had been moved for in a proper spirit; but it was intolerable, when a man had devoted his best energies to the public service, that not only his merit should not be recognized, but that he should be attacked in the manner Mr. Erle had been. He could not vote for a Committee moved for in so hostile a spirit, implying censure on honourable men, which, in his conscience, he believed to be wholly undeserved.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Sir, however much I may regret the highly-coloured, if not exaggerated statement made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Devonport, in bringing this Motion before the House, still I cannot help regretting the manner in which it has been met by Her Majesty's Government. When a Member of Parliament, on his own responsibility, comes down to this House with an imposing array of papers and a collection of oranges, and makes a speech of one hour and a half long, containing the gravest charges it is possible to make against gentlemen in a public office, I do not think it is becoming in the Government to resist the Committee so moved for. If the charges brought forward are found not to be founded on fact, they will rebound on the hon. Member [MR. FERRAND: Hear, hear!] and he will never be able—I will not say to show his face, for he is a man of great bravery—but, such charges not having been fully proved, again to bring forward a charge in this House. [MR. FERRAND: Hear, hear!] The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just resumed his seat has fallen into a mistake, as I do not understand that his hon. Friend the Member for Devonport (whom he is not on this occasion about to favour with his vote) made any attack on the three Commissioners. No, he did not fly at such high game, as, of course, there will always be found men in this House to defend those in high position. I rise, therefore, to defend men in a much more humble position, and the only defence I have to offer is, to urge that the Committee should be granted in order that statements so lavishly made by the hon. Member may be brought to the proof, and that men who occupy subordinate situations as compared with the Commissioners may not have their character damned, or be suffered to remain under these reproaches. The House will recollect that the hon. Member poured the whole vials, not of his wrath but of his charges, on the heads of these three gentlemen:—Mr. Offley Martin, Mr. Boase, and last, not least, the real Simon Pure, Mr. Simons. If the Committee is not to be granted, let me state the case with respect to Mr. Offley Martin. Some years ago, when the hon. Member for Devonport made serious charges against the Bingley Grammar School and the Sutherland Trust Estate, Mr. Offley Martin was sent down to inquire into those charges, and the inquiry took place in April, 1856. [MR. FERRAND: In 1857.] The inquiry was in 1857. Well, Mr. Martin, for the first day, conducted the inquiry entirely to the satisfaction of the hon. Member for Devonport. I do not know Mr. Martin even by sight; but it appears that the hon. Member was highly satisfied at the conduct of Mr. Offley Martin, who now, for the first time, I hear is a Whig. He has not the appearance or the manners of a Whig, but is a most affable and pleasing gentleman. On the second day the hon. Member for Devonport came forward, and made a most serious charge against the Rev. James Cheadle, that charge being no less than felony. It was a charge made against the rev. gentleman in respect to certain trust estates, that he had appropriated to himself the sum of £2 12s. 6d. out of the funds of the Sutherland Trust Estate. Mr. Martin examined into the matter, and told the hon. Gentleman he could not substantiate his charge. The Rev. Mr. Cheadle, however, employed a lawyer to conduct his case, and while the cross-examination was going on, Mr. Martin, fearing to enter into a parochial squabble, said, "I put my finger on this examination;" and in the interest of the hon. Member, who now abuses him for it, stopped the case. The Rev. J. Cheadle, who, so far from being a Whig, is a Conservative of the deepest dye, was so ungrateful to his party that he brought an action against the hon. Member for Devonport for libel and defamation of character. There was, as might be supposed, a great fluttering among the Conservatives in that quarter, when they found their favourite Member attacked in that way; but the affair was settled by the hon. Member withdrawing the charge he had made—the only charge, by the way, he has ever been known to retract—and paying over some £300 or £350 to the rev. gentleman.

[Mr. FERRAND: You are quite wrong.] Well, let the House grant the Committee, and I will prove the fact; and if the Rev. James Cheadle be alive, I will undertake to produce him as a witness. I now come to the case which has been very lightly touched upon, and which concerns Mr. Boase, one of the additional Inspectors. I know Mr. Boase, but I know nothing of the circumstances of his appointment. This, however, I can say, that what the hon. Gentleman has stated on the authority of some anonymous county baronet, is altogether a misconception. Mr. Boase was never the agent at any time of my hon. Friend the present Member for Tavistock, and has never betrayed that hon. Gentleman in any way. The fact is, that Mr. Boase was the political opponent of the hon. Gentleman and the personal friend of his antagonist. The hon. Member for Devonport brought a charge against Mr. Boase, and declared that because he has had only 8s. a week allowed him as travelling expenses he is not fit for his post. Now, if we have a Committee, I can prove that Mr. Boase, in the opinion of his employers and of all who know him, except, perhaps, a few high Conservatives at Totnes, as a man of business and as a gentleman, stands as high as any one in his profession. As to Mr. John Simons, whom the hon. Gentleman described as a coal dealer and potato merchant, I confess I know nothing. But is a man to be thus hunted down because he was, perhaps, in early life connected with commercial pursuits? There are some of the most respected men in this House connected with the coal interest; and as to Mr. Simons being a potato merchant, I am inclined to believe that the hon. Member put the potato into his sling in order to strike him with its additional weight. I understand, however, that every one acquainted with Mr. Simons is willing to bear testimony to his honourable conduct at all times, both as a private gentleman and an efficient public officer. But if the hon. Member says he can prove that this gentleman's appointment was an improper one, I am ready to support him in his demand for a Committee, in order to afford him the opportunity of doing so. The hon. Member spares nobody in his attacks but the three Commissioners. He says the whole office was a nest of Whigs. Well, all I can say is, that if that be really the case, I have no doubt but that the business is badly conducted. But how far is that assertion true? I know of my own knowledge that it is not the case. The hon. Member has fallen into several errors in the course of his speech. For instance, Mr. Erle's son has not been First Clerk for three or four years. So distinguished were the services of this gentleman as First Clerk that he was appointed to some office in connection with the Court of Chancery.

Mr. Bernal Osborne

Mr. MALINS: No! Common Pleas.

Mr. FERRAND: I said he had retired.

Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE: I own the hon. Gentleman had a pretty loud voice, but I did not hear him make that remark. With respect to Mr. Good, I can say that a better man, a more excellent public servant, or a more intense Conservative does not exist. He is a resident in Bucks, and one of the firmest supporters of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. [A VOICE: Ex!] I beg pardon, the ex-Chancellor, but he may be back again before long. When the hon. Member for Devonport brings forward such charges as he has done, he ought to be more careful as to his facts. Yet when a Member in his position makes such a speech as the hon. Member for Devonport has just made, I cannot resist the conclusion that his application for a Committee of Inquiry ought to be granted in order to clear the character of the gentlemen whose characters have been so seriously attacked, and to place them in a proper position before the country. I shall, therefore, support the Motion.

Mr. FERRAND: I wish to explain. ["Order!"] I may, perhaps, be allowed to make a statement. The hon. Member for Liskeard has said—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member can only explain an observation of his own which has been misunderstood. He cannot reply to the remarks of any one else.

Mr. FERRAND: I pray the House to allow me to make an explanation in respect to some statements which the hon. Gentleman has made. ["Order!"]

Mr. ADDERLEY said, he should be exceedingly sorry to give any vote which would appear in the slightest degree to reflect upon the Charity Commissioners or upon the Commission, for he firmly believed that a more able set of public servants, or a more useful public office, did not exist in the country. At the same time, a Motion had been made which he thought ought to be followed by an inquiry. The accusation was directed, not against the individual Charity Commissioners, for the only imputation he had heard made upon them was that they were Whigs, but against the administration and service of the office, and against the Government for the appointment of unfit Inspectors. He thought the Government would do ill if they shirked inquiry into that accusation, or if they believed they could rebut it by merely taking exception to the tone, temper, and manner in which it had been brought forward. They ought, when such a charge had been made, to be the very first to demand an investigation. The right hon. Gentleman who spoke for the Government said, singularly enough, he thought there ought to be an inquiry into the Commission, but not into the particular accusations that had been made: He took just the contrary view. There was no necessity, in his opinion, for a Committee on the Commission, but if he were a Member of the Government, he should deem it essential to their character to have a full and complete inquiry into the charges which had been brought forward against them.

Mr. LOWE: Sir, I have been an unpaid Charity Commissioner for five years, and I cannot, therefore, allow the debate to close without bearing my most earnest testimony in favour of the gentlemen who conduct the office, and those who work under them, and the manner in which they perform the heavy duties intrusted to them. As I have said before, I believe that more industrious, able, and useful public servants there are not than those in this office. I have been called on to explain several things by the hon. Member for Devonport, but I do not think it is necessary for me to do so. Indeed, had I not felt it my duty to bear public testimony to the character of the gentlemen in this Department, I should not have risen at all. What I may have said in conversation with the hon. Member for Leeds some years ago I do not know, but if the hon. Gentleman repeated, as he may have done, what I said, he did not do so, I am sure, with the intention that it should be published in this House. As to the case of Giggleswick School, which has been mentioned, the facts are very simple. There was an old quarrel between the master and the usher, into which Mr. Martin very prudently refused to enter, seeing that the parties had since been reconciled. The Commissioners, however, finding that the trust was not satisfactorily conducted, instead of going into bygone grievances, introduced a scheme by which the Trustees were chosen, not simply within the parish of Giggleswick, but within a radius of twenty miles. This change has met with general approval, and has put an end to all difficulties. I cannot agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard, or my hon. Friend opposite, that an inquiry is necessary. Because an hon. Member chooses to get up—without the slightest deference to the feelings of people unable to defend themselves and unable to give notice to those who would gladly defend them, as I myself would have done if they had intrusted me with the duty—and to scatter his accusations, broadcast, without regard to the fact that all we say is printed and circulated, and that thereby a stain may be affixed to the character of people who may have no public opportunity of wiping it off, because a gentleman who—and I speak of it with reserve—has special reasons connected with his past career in this House for being particularly cautious in the exercise of that right of freedom of speech which we all possess and all glory in, and which, therefore, we are bound to use with dignity, moderation, and care for the feelings of others—I say I do not think that when under such circumstances an hon. Gentleman thinks fit to make such charges there is necessarily thrown upon the House, because through want of notice no answer can at the moment be given to them, the duty of sending them to a Select Committee for investigation. My hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard did what he seldom does—he fell into an inconsistency, because he demanded a Committee on the ground that the hon. Gentleman's charges ought to be inquired into, and then he set himself to prove, in a most admirable manner, that many of them were, within his own knowledge, destitute of foundation. He showed, for instance, that Mr. Martin was quite above using the sort of language imputed to him. The hon. Member has shown in the same way that both Mr. Boase and Mr. Good are not the kind of gentlemen they have been represented by the hon. Member for Devonport. He has also shown how unfair are the hon. Member's representations about the Bingley case, which was actually made the subject of inquiry in a court of law, where I have heard upon good authority the hon. Gentleman had to pay a large sum on account of those very charges which he is so angry with Mr. Martin for not choosing to investigate. I should have thought that under these circumstances my hon. Friend's logical mind would hardly have deemed the appointment of a Select Committee necessary. I differ from the opinion that the hon. Gentleman cast no aspersions upon Mr. Erle. The hon. Member repeated over and over again the most offensive insinuations about Mr. Fearon being connected by marriage with Mr. Erle, and these insinuations could only have been made for the purpose of conveying the impression that the Commissioner and his relative were in a sort of league to extract money out of the pockets of the suitors. I can show the House, also, what I consider to be a conclusive reason why the charges made by the hon. Gentleman should be entirely disregarded. When the hon. Gentleman moved for papers upon this subject, he asserted that the Charity Commissioners had extracted—for that was the word he employed—£78,000 from the money of the charities, and he pledged himself to prove the statement if an opportunity were afforded him for doing so. [Mr. FERRAND: No, no!] What does the hon. Member say upon the subject now? Why, that, although the Charity Commissioners transacted gratuitously the business of the charities at Bedford, they had contracted bills with the town clerk and other solicitors to the amount of £500. And this is all the evidence he brings before the House in support of such an accusation, evidence that does not even call for examination. There is not the slightest proof to connect those attorneys' bills with anything unbecoming; and I ask whether the House, with this sample of the hon. Gentleman's statements before them, is prepared to sanction an investigation into the character of every man in the office, from the first Commissioner down to the record-keeper or the clerk who manages the accounts, and to go into all the decisions given by these gentlemen in the course of their duties all over the country? We know that there must be many persons discontented with the mode of distributing these charities, which form oftentimes in boroughs the arena for political strife. I feel sure that the recklessness of assertion and vehemence of charge displayed by the hon. Gentleman in the statements which he has made this evening will satisfy the House that no Parliamentary inquiry is needed.

MR. FERRAND said, he wished to explain. When he quoted the £78,000 referred to by the right hon. Member for Calne, he distinctly stated that he had taken the figures from a Return made by Mr. Apsley Pellatt in that House. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to an action brought against him with reference to what had occurred while Mr. Martin was at Bingley. ["Order!"]

MR. J. A. SMITH: Sir, being connected with one of the persons whom the hon. Member has thought fit to charge with offensive and disgraceful conduct, I hope the House will permit me to make a few observations. Mr. Grey is charged with having paid his attorney's bill through the appointment of Mr. Boase, which he had solicited and procured. Now, if the hon. Member had shown me the courtesy of giving me notice of his intention to make this charge, I should have been prepared with ample evidence to meet a charge so utterly and gratuitously false. I must confess, however, I am perfectly easy under the charges he has made, and I cannot believe that any Gentleman in this House is justified in attaching much importance to accusations brought forward by the hon. Member in so wild, so careless, and so reckless a manner. Under ordinary circumstances I should be inclined to concur with the hon. Member for Liskeard in the opinion that it was desirable to grant a Committee of Inquiry in the face of charges of so grave a character; but I do think and feel that the hon. Member for Devonport has lost the right of calling for an inquiry of this kind. The grounds upon which I make that assertion, and upon which I shall vote against the Motion, are to be found in the Journals of this House. I find the following statement on the Journals of the House. On the 10th of April, 1844, the House agreed to the following Resolution:—

"That the said Sir James Graham and James Weir Hogg, esq., having in their places denied the imputations cast upon them, and William Bushfield Ferrand, esq., having avowed that he had used the said expressions, and having declined to substantiate the truth of them, this House is of opinion that the imputations conveyed in the said expressions are wholly unfounded and calumnious, and that they do not affect in the slightest degree the honour and the character of the Members to whom they were applied."

I now also say that the charges which the hon. Gentleman has brought against Mr. Grey are not only in the same manner unfounded and without even a shadow of foundation, but that he has forfeited his right to expect any consideration to be given to any charges he may bring; and I take the liberty of saying to him that the accusations he has made to-night against Mr. Grey do not in the slightest degree affect the honour or character of that gentleman, nor will they permit me to vote for the Committee which the hon. Gentleman has moved for.

MR. MALINS said, if there was the slightest ground for supposing that the Commissioners had not faithfully discharged their duty, he should have voted for the inquiry. But when he found the hon. Member casting imputations upon so many highly respectable and honourable gentlemen, and against a Commission that was working admirably, he could not avoid raising his voice in condemnation of such a course, and declaring that he would be no party to the appointment of any such Committee as he had asked for. Although the hon. Member for Devonport sat upon his (Mr. Malins's) side of the House, he must say that he had listened with much pain and regret to his speech. He should have wished that he had brought forward his Motion with greater moderation of language and with greater delicacy for the feelings of others. He (Mr. Malins) could not on this occasion, nor would he on any other, be a party to attacks of such a personal nature. He regretted that he could not concur with many of those hon. Members around him in voting for this Committee of Inquiry.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, there was one point on which he wished for information before he determined on which side he should vote. On this point he was already determined—that the Board of Commissioners was at any rate preferable to the Court of Chancery. Anything worse than the Court of Chancery, as superintendent of charities, was impossible. He wished to know whether, if the inquiry were granted, the question of costs would be considered, as, if so, he certainly should vote for it? He did not wish to say one word against the Charity Commissioners, but he must say that the bills of the solicitors in some cases were exorbitant, and required revision.

The House divided:—Ayes 116; Noes 40: Majority 76.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(1.) £3,200, to complete the sum for the Civil Establishment, Bermudas.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he thought the colonial revenue should be called upon to meet expenditure for colonial purposes. It was true that of late steps in that direction had been taken, but further progress should be made. A colony with a local revenue, which had increased from £11,000 to £17,000 a year, and a population of only 12,000 inhabitants, might well be required to meet its own expenses.

MR. CARDWELL said, he would admit that if the revenue of the colony were able for a series of years to maintain its own expenses, there would be no ground for asking a vote for that purpose from that House; but such was not the case.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £3,213, to complete the sum for the Ecclesiastical Establishment, British North American Provinces.

(3.) £1,000, Indian Department, Canada.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to call the attention of the Government to the permission granted by Governor Dallas to Major Hatch, commanding the United States' troops, to cross the frontier and attack the unfortunate Indians, who were gallantly defending themselves against the United States' troops, and who had taken refuge in British territory. The permission, he maintained, was opposed to international law. He had formerly referred to the subject, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to explain more fully under what circumstances the permission had been given.

MR. CARDWELL observed, that the subject had no reference whatever to the vote before the Committee. The territory in question was not in Canada or under Canadian authority, but under that of the Hudson's Bay Company. He had stated on a former occasion that permission had been given, and he had the pleasure to add that it had never been acted upon.

MR. WATKIN said, that the Indians who were at war with the United States considered themselves under the dominion of the British Crown. He believed the facts of the case were these. The chief of the tribe, who was called the Little Crow, attended by many of his people, came into Fort Gurry, in the Hudson's Bay territory, and demanded assistance in arms and food. Governor Dallas, while ready to give food, would not give arms, which if used for warfare might create difficulties with a friendly nation, but he undertook to use his friendly offices in order to procure a fair consideration of the claims of these unfortunate Indians. With that view he wrote a very excellent despatch to the Governor of Minnesota, and he received a suitable reply. Being in Canada in July last, he had gone with Governor Dallas to Lord Monck, the Governor General, when the circumstances of the case were fully before him. The reply given was that, when Lord Lyons came to Canada, the circumstances should be stated to him, but that as Governor General of Canada he had nothing to do with the Hudson's Bay territory. Governor Dallas had found himself in a most painful and difficult position when applied to to permit the forces of the United States to cross the frontier. Those Indians who came to him demanding arms and food were all decorated with the British medal, which they received in 1812 as allies of the British nation from "their old father King George;" and when Minnesota was given up they were told, if ever they required assistance, if they would only go to the North, they would always find the red flag flying. When they did apply for assistance, Governor Dallas had no military force to resist the military incursion of the United States' troops, and he very unwisely, but under pressure, permitted Major Hatch to cross the frontier. The right hon. Gentleman said the permission given had not been acted upon, but from the information he had received he believed it had been acted upon. He was sorry to think that these old relations with the Indian tribes, rude as they might be, were being broken up, and under circumstances which must damage the prestige of the country. It was another argument for settling the possessions of the Hudson's Bay Company, which if not Anglicized would soon be Americanized.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask who Governor Dallas was. Was he in any degree under British authority, and was it the British flag that was flying over the Hudson's Bay port? Was the territory British territory? If not, what territory was it?

M. Watkin

MR. BLAKE said, he believed great injustice had been done in the case of some of these Indians by the Canada Government. It would be remembered that some time since an Indian chief had been introduced by the Duke of Newcastle to Her Majesty, who, after hearing his statement of grievances, promised that when the Duke went to British North America with the Prince of Wales inquiries should be made into the facts of the case. He wished to know whether the Duke had made the promised inquiries, and whether any redress had been obtained for the Indians.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he perfectly recollected the case to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The conduct of Indian affairs had been handed over to the Canadian Government, and in consequence of that transfer the Vote had been reduced from many thousands a year to the trifling sum of £1,000, which went in pensions to some old Indians who had served the British Crown in former wars. Under these circumstances, all power and responsibility having been transferred to Canada, we could not undertake to dictate what course the Canadian Government should pursue in their dealings with the Indian tribes as to the sale of their lands or any matter of that kind. And although he knew that the Duke of Newcastle did interest himself in this matter, and did make inquiries regarding it while in Canada, yet officially he did not think it his duty to interfere.

MR. CARDWELL said, there could be no doubt that the territory in question was British territory, and that the Sovereign of that territory was the Sovereign of Great Britain; but it was also known that it was under the Government of the Hudson's Bay Company. Governor Dallas was a gentleman exceedingly well known, and a most valuable servant of the Hudson's Bay Company.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, that Governor Dallas was nominated by the Hudson's Bay Company, and was not the representative of the Crown. He supposed that the Vote entirely represented pensions, and had nothing to do with the distribution of presents to the Indians, which had an injurious effect, as the presents were often exchanged for ardent spirits.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the Vote was strictly for expiring life-pensions paid to Indians who were formerly in our service.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £21,273, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the Salaries of the Governors, Lieutenant Governors, and others, in the West Indies, and certain other Colonies."

Mr. ADDERLEY wished to repeat a question relative to a matter on which he had previously sought information. He wished to know whether certain ecclesiastical payments in the West Indies were to continue to be voted by Parliament.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that those payments were charged by Act of Parliament upon the Consolidated Fund, and had never appeared on the Votes.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN complained that the salary of the Governor of Western Australia was paid out of the Imperial Treasury, while all the other Australian Colonies paid their own Governors.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the distinction made in the case of Western Australia arose from the circumstances of its being to a great extent a penal colony to which the mother country sent her convicts.

Mr. ARTHUR MILLS said, he wished to ask for an explanation of the item of £1,000 for the High Commissioner of British Caffraria; and also to inquire whether any measures had been taken to annex British Caffraria to the Cape Colony, as had been in contemplation a few years ago.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the allowance of £1,000 to the Governor of the Cape, as High Commissioner of British Caffraria, was paid to him not solely in his character of Governor of the Cape Colony, but rather in his diplomatic character as administrator of Foreign affairs in connection with our South African settlements. In answer to the hon. Member's second question, he had to state that no arrangement had yet been made for annexing British Caffraria to the Cape of Good Hope, and that it still continued a separate settlement.

Mr. AUGUSTUS SMITH complained that in the case of these West India Islands the expenditure in almost every case exceeded the revenue.

Mr. BLAKE said, he thought that in the case of the Governors of these small islands the office should be held for a longer period than five years.

Mr. CAVE said, he did not agree with the hon. Gentleman. He thought Governors were retained very often only too long; and when they failed in one Government were punished by being sent to a better. He suggested that it would be well if these small colonies were governed by persons sent from the permanent staff of the Colonial Office, so that if they failed, they might be recalled and resume their work at home instead of being re-appointed to Colonial Governorships out of a feeling of compassion, there being no other resource for them.

Mr. HENNESSY said, he observed that one of the items in the Vote was £450 for "residing magistrate of Anguilla." That colony was an island sixteen miles in length and one and a half in breadth. It had scarcely any trade, although it was formerly of more importance, as it was the spot from which Sea Island cotton was originally brought, though it no longer flourished there. The population consisted of 100 whites and 2,400 blacks, and there was a local body which levied taxes and seemed to regulate the charges which the House was called upon to pay. The revenue of the island, according to the last Return, was £414. He did not propose to touch the sum heretofore allowed for the official staff there, but the £450 was an increase of the amount usually voted for Anguilla, and the Committee would bear in mind that it was an increase which exceeded the whole revenue of the colony. He, therefore, moved the reduction of the Vote by a sum of £450.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, he should support the reduction.

Whereupon, Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £450, for the Presiding Magistrate of Anguilla, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Hennessy.)

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE thought the hon. Member for the King's County had treated the House with an original argument in stating that because the colony was poor and its revenue was only £414 it should not be assisted in providing for the support of a magistrate. It was simply because the island was so poor that the House was asked to pay the salary of a stipendiary magistrate.

Mr. ADDERLEY said, he could not perceive any inconsistency in the argument of the hon. Member for the King's County. According to the principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman, a barren rock would be best entitled to a grant of public money. Again, the smallness of the revenue of the colony might proceed, not from poverty, but from the lightness of its taxation, and it would be unfair to tax the British taxpayer to enable the colonists to escape from a burden which they ought more properly to bear. He certainly should support the Amendment.

Mr. HENNESSY observed, that the official Report of the Governor stated that the people generally were indolent, and that that indolence arose partly from their having no incentive to continuous labour, and having been fostered by grants of public money from the Treasury. To give these people an incentive to industry he should press his Motion to a division.

Mr. CARDWELL said, the island was sixty miles from St. Kitt's, that the resident magistrate had died last year, and that it was deemed necessary to appoint some one who would see that justice was administered and order maintained among its 2,500 inhabitants.

Mr. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, there was an allowance to the Chief Justice of St. Kitt's, and that Anguilla was a mere dependency. Last year the Chief Justice was called Chief Justice of Anguilla.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to know what were the duties of the Chief Justice of St. Kitt's with regard to Anguilla.

Mr. CARDWELL replied, that the Chief Justice visited the island in the discharge of his judicial duties, but he did not act as a magistrate.

Mr. DILLWYN said, he wished to ask on what principle the Government proceeded in making those appointments. What was the minimum number of inhabitants for which a resident magistrate was deemed necessary?

Mr. CARDWELL: I believe this is the minimum.

Mr. ARTHUR MILLS said, his objection to the payment was, it tended to make the island unproductive and the people indolent. If grants of that kind were continued, no effort would be made to raise a larger revenue. He should support the reduction on the simple principle that the colonies, which we wished to make self-supporting, ought to do something to support themselves.

Mr. CAVE said, he did not think that the proposition of depriving the island of a stipendiary magistrate would have the effect of inducing the people to work. The cause which had interfered with the prosperity of the West India Islands was the legislation of this country, from the effect of which they had not yet recovered, and this formed the real justification of the assistance afforded by us in regard to these charges.

Mr. ARTHUR MILLS said, he would remind the hon. Member that Parliament had granted compensation to those islands to the extent of £20,000,000.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 45: Majority 11.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(5.) £6,200, to complete the sum for Justices, West India.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £14,355, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the Civil Establishments on the Western Coast of Africa."

SIR JOHN HAY said, he found that the sum of £2,000 was set down in the Vote for the expenses of the Ashantee war. He believed that war had cost more than £200,000, and he had also to observe that when the hon. and gallant Member for Portarlington had moved for a statement of the cost of the war, the return made by the Colonial Office was that they had not yet received any information upon the subject. Under those circumstances he wished to know why only the charge of £2,000 appeared in the Vote, when it was notorious that £200,000 was nearer the mark.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, that it was a misnomer to speak of that as a war expenditure. Although many men had been lost by the climate, he believed that not a shot had been fired.

Mr. CARDWELL said, that when the Estimate was framed, the Colonial Office had received an intimation from the Governor that he had drawn £1,900 for raising levies of troops. That being the only information in the possession of the Office, it was thought right to ask for a Vote of £2,000. He had received no information which would enable him to lay any other Estimate before the House.

Mr. WALPOLE said, that he noticed in the papers which had been produced by the Colonial Office, that the despatches of the right hon. Gentleman's excellent predecessor, the Duke of Newcastle, referred to some despatches which had not been printed, but which were the most important of all. Perhaps his right hon. Friend would say whether he would lay on the table those despatches which induced the Duke of Newcastle to express a strong opinion upon the conduct of a certain officer with respect to the war.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the despatches to which the right hon. Gentleman referred were not included in the papers which had been laid before Parliament—first, because they did not come within the terms of the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and, in the next place, because it did not appear to those who prepared the papers that they would throw any additional light upon the subject. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman and the House wished to know more of the differences of opinion which occurred as to the conduct last year of the war in defence of the protected territories, and of the part which was taken by the then commanding officer, Major Cochrane, he knew no reason why those despatches should not be produced. He would endeavour to lay them on the table to-morrow.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he had read the papers referred to, and had been struck by the same circumstance which the right hon. Gentleman had noticed. It seemed suspicious on the face of it that if there were good reasons for embarking in that war, and for jeopardizing our forces in the same foolish way that we had done in New Zealand, they should not be stated. Let the House be informed what they were, and then they would see whether they could feel confidence in the conduct of affairs by Her Majesty's Government. The House at present knew very little of the matter, and with the object of enabling them to gain the requisite information he would move that the Chairman report Progress.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir John Trelawny.)

SIR JOHN HAY said, he hoped the Secretary of State would also lay on the table the despatch issued by the right hon. Gentleman who conducted the affairs of the Colonial Office during the lamented illness of the Duke of Newcastle, and the despatch containing a remonstrance from Commander Wilmot.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE remarked that the Vote ought to be postponed until the whole of our relations with the Coast of Africa ought to be discussed and revised, and that the time had come when we ought to select the points necessary for controlling the trade and advancing the civilization of the country, with a view to concentrating our establishments and reducing expenditure as much as possible.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was anxious to give the fullest information to the House at the earliest moment, and if a desire existed to postpone the Vote he should be happy to consult the convenience of the House. The Return produced had been prepared in accordance with the terms of the Motion, but further papers should be forthcoming if desired.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he approved the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman. As it indicated a reversal of the policy pursued for the last few years, it was evident the Department was beginning to draw in its horns. After the statement of the right hon. Gentleman however he should not press his Motion.

Motion, and Original Question, by leave, withdrawn.

(8.) £960, Heligoland.

MR. ADDERLEY said, the Vote provided for the service of one clergyman at £50 and two magistrates at £30 each. He wished to ask for some explanation.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE explained that the community was exceedingly primitive in its character. He was unable to say whether those Gentlemen received any additional income from local revenues.

Vote agreed to.

(9.) £3,608, to complete the sum for the Falkland Islands.

(10.) £3,825, to complete the sum for Labuan.

(11.) £300, Pitcairn Islanders, Norfolk Island.

MR. BLAKE said, the whole amount appeared to be devoted to the salary of a schoolmaster.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the Committee could hardly form an idea of the simplicity and childlike character of these people, who really needed some intelligent, clever Englishman to look after affairs in general for them. The schoolmaster not only instructed the children, but kept all the public accounts, and rendered invaluable assistance to the community.

(12.) £7,720, to complete the sum for Emigration.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he wished to know what was done by that body, having its offices in an obscure back street, and with no public funds at its disposal beyond the salaries of its members. It appeared that some of the colonies had emigration agents of their own in this country, while other colonies had their emigration business conducted by that Board. He believed that but for that business the Board would have very little work of any kind to perform.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained of the staff of six clerks as altogether too large. One had been added since the previous year.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he hoped some assurance would be given to the Committee, that if a State Emigration Department were maintained, no vessels except those which were seaworthy would be allowed in future to leave with emigrants.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he would remind hon. Members that a large proportion of the emigration was conducted at the instance of the colonies, which provided the necessary means. He should lament any diminution of the usefulness of the Emigration Board, which consisted of very efficient men.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE said, that the Lancashire City Relief Fund had set apart a portion of its funds for the purpose of assisting emigration, but they had met with so little success that the sum thus set aside had been re-transferred to the main fund. The difficulties interposed were the more extraordinary, as he had been assured the other day by a member of the Legislature of Sydney, that the Australian Colonies could receive any amount of emigration. There appeared to be something defective in the emigration machinery under such circumstances.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he would be glad to know what sort of supervision was exercised by the Board, and what were its duties?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the Emigration Board was one of the most effective of our public departments, with important and onerous duties to perform. The Board, by the desire of the colonies in question, superintended the emigration to Victoria, Western Australia, and Port Natal. The Board chartered the ships, appointed the surgeons, and looked after the emigration depôts. Another important branch of its duties was to superintend and work the Passenger Act. No doubt breaches of that Act occasionally occurred, but they would be still more numerous if the Board did not exist. The Emigration Board had also to superintend the great system of Coolie emigration from the East Indies and China to the West Indian colonies and the Mauritius. That necessitated frequent communication with the Colonial and Indian Offices. The Board chartered the ships and advised the Secretary of State for the Colonies on all matters relating to emigration, and also on questions affecting the management and disposal of the Crown lands in all colonies where they had not been made over to the local Government. It was also called upon to report upon every despatch from the West Indian Colonies, the Mauritius, and Natal, relative to emigration in all its branches. The Colonial Office was thus brought into constant communication with the Emigration Board, and derived the most valuable assistance from the long experience and ability of the Emigration Commissioners. The Board likewise embodied in its Colonization Circular advice relative to the wages, demand for labour, and means of reaching the colonies.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS inquired whether Victoria and all the provinces of New Zealand did not take up their own ships and manage their own emigration?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that was not the case with regard to Victoria. He believed it was true of New Zealand.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE said, he wished to know the number of emigrants sent out by this costly machinery?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the number could be given, but it would only represent one portion of the duties of the Board.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to know why there were six officers at Liverpool that year, against five officers in the last year, for the superintendence of emigration.

MR. CARDWELL observed, that the House, knowing the largely increased emigration from Liverpool that year, would not be surprised that an additional officer had been found necessary.

In answer to Mr. ADDERLEY,

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the Secretary to the Board (Mr. Walcott) had been appointed Second Commissioner as well as Secretary.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he had attacked that Vote for many years. When he first began there were three Commissioners. By perseverance he got the number reduced to two, and he believed that if they were further reduced to a single Commissioner he would be quite sufficient for all the duties of the Board.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, there was, in fact, only one Commissioner now. There were certain duties which were required by law to be performed by two Commissioners, and for the purpose of enabling that to be done the Secretary had received powers to perform those duties.

CAPTAIN JERVIS observed, that among the other duties of the emigration officers was this—they were not only to assist emigration from this country but to see that the people went to a fair field for their labour on leaving this country. He wanted to know if they had taken any trouble with respect to those emigrants who were leaving Ireland and going to the United States for the purpose of being murdered at so many dollars a head. That was an important question. It was their duty to see that these unfortunate people, leaving their country under false pretences, were protected, and had a fair field to go to for the exercise of their labour.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE replied, that it was not for the Emigration Commissioners, or any Department of the Government, to undertake the paternal duty of persuading emigrants to go to one country rather than another. With respect to unassisted emigrants, their duty simply was to carry out the provisions of the Passengers Act. With respect to assisted emigrants, they chartered the vessels, appointed officers, and exercised a very strict control.

MR. MONSELL said, the observations of the hon. Under Secretary might be true, but there ought to be some British authority in New York and Boston to see that the emigrants were not unfairly dealt with. The number of men who enlisted in Ireland for the United States' army was very small compared with those who were laid hold of when they went abroad. In the present exigency it would be desirable that either the Foreign Office or the Emigration Commissioners should take some steps for the protection of those poor people against the arts that were used to entrap them.

COLONEL DUNNE said, an immense number of unfortunate people from Ireland went over to America without the slightest intention of enlisting, and get entrapped there. He knew an instance of a man who on arriving at the other side of the water fell in with people who gave him drink, and when he awoke he found himself in the uniform of the United States' army, and was told that he had enlisted, and if he refused to serve he should be shot. He was sent to the scene of war, fought for six months, and, luckily for himself, got ague. They then sent him into hospital, and after a time he made his escape at the risk of being shot, and got home to Ireland. The same thing had happened to several. Why should not the Government call upon the Consular authorities in the United States to put a stop to doings of that kind? At that moment a great number of our soldiers were about to be discharged after their ten years' service, and he had reason to believe that there were Federal agents in this country for the purpose of catching them, to become non-commissioned officers in the Federal army if it was in existence, as he hoped it was not at the present moment.

MR. DILLWYN remarked, that it would be dangerous for the Government to give paternal advice to our emigrants.

MR. MOOR inquired how the Commissioners sitting in Park Street could possibly regulate the coolie emigration between China and the West Indies when they were not upon the spot where the emigration was going on.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, of course, the emigration must in a great measure be regulated on the spot. But then it was absolutely necessary that the Government at home should superintend the whole process, which was conducted under the strictest rules for the protection of the emigrants. Those rules were framed by the Colonial Office, with the advice of the Land and Emigration Commissioners.

MR. CAVE said, that as allusion had been made to coolie emigration, it was but just that he should bear testimony to the efficiency of the Commissioners. Nothing could be more stringent than the rules laid down and enforced by the Board in Park Lane. The people of the West Indies, indeed, complained that the regulations were much too strict. He did not concur in this, and, as far as his experience went, no Department of the Government was more efficiently conducted than the Emigration Board.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, it was all very well for the hon. Member for Swansea to talk of the Government not interfering with the emigrants. But it was generally believed that they had encouraged the emigration of Irishmen to North America, and allowed the North American authorities to enlist men in Ireland for the purpose of recruiting their armies, while the same privilege was not given to the Southern States. The object of spending money on emigration was to open fresh labour markets; but the Government certainly ought to explain how it was that emigration was made the means of enlistments which were not only contrary to our own laws, but those of the United States.

MR. CARDWELL said, he had heard a good many strange things in his time, but he had never heard anything more astonishing than the allegation that the Government and the Emigration Commissioners had encouraged these enlistments. It was not the duty of the Emigration Commissioners to tell the people where to go, but they provided them with information as to various colonies. The anecdotes told by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite showed how blameless the Emigration Commissioners were in that matter, for the men of whom he spoke never intended to enlist at all. He could not sit down without bearing his testimony to the valuable, praiseworthy, and conscientious services of the Emigration Commissioners.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the Emigration Commissioners had assured him that there was no reason to believe that those enlistments had actually been the cause of any considerable increase of emigration. The number of able-bodied single men emigrating had but little increased.

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

MR. HIBBERT said, there were at that moment agents engaged in the country in tempting the Lancashire operatives to emigrate to work in mills in America. That was done openly, and though he regretted that these people should go, it would be unfair to them if the Government were to interfere.

Vote agreed to.

(13.) £32,550, to complete the sum for the Treasury Chest.

MR. DAWSON asked for an explanation of the item of £29,550 to make good a loss on transactions of the Treasury Chest?

MR. PEEL said, that the transactions of the Treasury resulted in a profit everywhere except in China. The profit this year amounted to over £10,000 a year, but the loss in China was caused by the difference between the army rate of the dollar and the price at which it was purchased. The rate at which the dollar was entered in the army accounts was 4s. 2d., but the price at which the dollar had to be purchased during 1862-3 varied from 4s. 6d. to 4s. 7d. It was proposed to raise the army rate, but this was postponed for the present pending the erection of a mint at Hong Kong.

MR. WALPOLE remarked, that the explanation only referred to one item of the account. There was an item of £32,000 for discount on bills. How did that occur?

MR. PEEL said, the same explanation applied to all the items. The money was paid in dollars, but bills had to be purchased for those dollars at the rate of 4s. 6d. per dollar.

(14.) £12,500, for the Zambesi Expedition.

MR. WALPOLE asked, what was the present state of affairs in the Zambesi district, and whether the expedition was to be continued on the existing footing, or were the Englishmen who had been sent there to remain?

MR. LAYARD said, he regretted to say that the expedition had failed. Dr. Livingstone had left the country, and was on his route home by way of India. The expedition would be given up altogether, and this, therefore, would be the last Vote asked for.

MR. WALPOLE said, he wished to know whether the Englishmen stationed there were to come home?

MR. LAYARD said, they could come home.

MR. F. S. POWELL observed, that all classes in this country, especially in religious and scientific circles, took a great interest in the expedition, and he thought it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to give more information than was contained in the jaunt explanation they had just heard.

MR. LAYARD said, that until Dr. Livingstone returned to England it would be impossible to give a full explanation to the House. Dr. Livingstone would return to this country, and Government did not think it right to spend any further money for the prosecution of the expedition.

MR. HADFIELD inquired, whether the failure of the expedition was to be attributed to the unfriendly feeling of the Portuguese Government?

MR. LAYARD replied, that he could not say that it was owing to unfriendly feeling on the part of the Portuguese Government, but he believed that the slave-trading operations carried on by Portuguese colonists in a great measure tended to produce the result.

MR. PAULL asked, whether, as the expedition had failed, that was the last Vote that would be proposed on account of the expedition?

MR. LAYARD said, he could not say but that there might be some small balance yet to be made up.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) £2,000, for the Niger Expedition.

MR. LAYARD stated, that the Niger Expedition, so far from being a failure, had been attended with a great success, and there was a strong feeling in favour of the Vote among mercantile men.

MR. HORSFALL said, he begged to dissent from the observation that the mercantile community were in favour of the Vote, for mercantile men were afraid that the expedition would not be attended with any practical result.

MR. LAYARD said, he was aware that some persons thought so, but a large number were of a contrary opinion.

Vote agreed to.

(16.) £55,000, to complete the sum for Captured Negroes, Bounties on Slaves, &c.

MR. CAVE called attention to a great piece of extravagance—namely, the payment of £5,500 expenses and compensation in the case of the Bushair, captured and destroyed by H. M. S. Sidon, the seizure having been illegal. He adverted to other instances of large sums spent in payment of compensation to vessels which had been captured as slavers, but were not really so. It appeared that the Iola and Castilia, bearing the Spanish flag, on being captured were sent to Jamaica, to the Vice Admiralty Court, instead of being taken before the mixed Commission Court at Havana; and when the mistake about jurisdiction was found out the sum of £3,044 was paid for compensation in one case, and £3,100 in the other, the chief part of which arose from demurrage. In the case of the Laura, Captain Hillier complained of delay in the Vice Admiralty Courts of Antigua, and there seemed to be good ground for his so doing. He (Mr. Cave) thought it right to call the attention of the Government to this subject, in order that the system necessary for repressing the slave trade might not fall into disrepute.

MR. LAYARD said, that when vessels were captured with colours and papers they were taken to the Mixed Commission Courts, which alone could deal efficiently with the cases, but when there were no papers or colours the matter went before Vice Admiralty Courts. With regard to the Castilia, it was an unfortunate mistake. The owner proceeded for compensation, and, after a full investigation, a sum was awarded, which the Government had no alternative but to pay. There were of course instructions to commanders of cruisers to be as careful as possible.

MR. CAVE asked for an explanation of how it was that demurrage for so long a period as 230 days had been incurred.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY said, that the reason was that the Barracouta, which had captured the vessel, was suddenly ordered to sea in consequence of having the yellow fever on board, and getting short of coal she came to England to replenish. That caused delay in adjudicating on the captured vessel, but the conduct of the captain in coming to England was approved by the Admiralty.

MR. CAVE said, he thought that no answer.

Vote agreed to.

(17.) £7,650, to complete the sum for Commissions for Suppression of Slave Trade.

MR. CAVE observed, that there was now a Mixed Commission Court at New York under the new treaty, but it was hardly likely that any slaver would be taken in there. In other Mixed Commission

Courts also, there was but little to do in consequence of slavers without colours or papers going before Vice Admiralty Courts. He stated facts to prove how few cases were taken before these courts, and though admitting that some were necessary, he said it was a question whether some others might not be dispensed with.

MR. TORRENS said, he saw no necessity for an arbitrator at the Cape of Good Hope. Not a single case had yet been tried in the Mixed Commission Court at New York. Again, at Havannah, there were only two cases of slavers captured, though 8,000 slaves had been landed in the island. It was very gratifying to hear of the great exertions which were being made by the Captain General of Cuba to put down the slave trade, but he hoped that the Government would take into consideration the circumstance that the Mixed Commission Courts had proved quite a failure, and he thought the expenditure upon them might be considerably diminished. It might not be possible for our Government at once to put an end to them without previous negotiations with Foreign Powers, but many of the appointments were unnecessary and ought to be done away with.

MR. LAYARD stated that the Mixed Commission Courts had jurisdiction in cases which could not be dealt with by the Vice Admiralty Courts. Where there were neither flags nor papers the Vice Admiralty Courts might condemn the vessels, but could not touch the captains and owners, whereas the Mixed Commission Courts could do both. The consequence was, that when a vessel was chased, the flags and papers were thrown overboard to avoid being taken before the Mixed Commission. If they abolished the Mixed Commission these vessels would retain their flags and papers, and the persons connected with them would escape with impunity. On the coast of Africa the Mixed Commission Courts were found very effective in the suppression of the slave trade; and, besides, they were bound by treaty to keep them up. An arbitrator had been appointed at the Cape of Good Hope, out of courtesy to the American Government; but elsewhere the post of arbitrator and registrar had not been filled up, and he hoped that in course of time they might make arrangements by which those officers might be still further reduced in number.

Mr. Cave

(18.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £124,503, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the Consular Establishments abroad."

MR. CAVE observed, that there were two Consuls and one Vice Consul in Cuba charged in the Estimates, but besides these there were several consular agents. He inquired by whom they were appointed? He asked the question because he had heard, but he could not vouch for the fact, that the authorities there, both Spanish and English, were hampered in putting down the slave trade in consequence of want of information from remote parts of the island, a circumstance easily accounted for, if it were true as reported, that some of the consular agents were slave owners. He hoped that special care was taken to appoint proper persons for consular agents in Cuba.

MR. LAYARD replied that the officers in question were appointed by the Foreign Office on the nomination of Consul General Crawford, who had, perhaps, done more for the suppression of the slave trade than any other man living, and who would not recommend any one in whom he had not entire confidence.

MR. W. WILLIAMS observed, that the Consular Staff at Venice, Warsaw, and Morocco, among other places, was unnecessarily large.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH asked for information as to the increase of salaries to Consuls. They had increased from £135,000 to £138,000, and he should like to know why there were so many consulships in which the fees were not credited. If the fees were part of the salary, that ought to be stated. He thought that many Consulships, at Venice, Leipsic, Warsaw, were excessive. As for the Consulate at Réunion, to which he had always objected, he thought the expense of it should be defrayed out of the funds of our East Indian territories.

MR. LAYARD said, that the cases to which the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) had referred were exceptional, for the Consuls General at Venice, Warsaw, and Morocco had to discharge important diplomatic functions. He took credit to the Foreign Office for the reductions which had already been effected in that branch, while at the same time the recommendations of the Committee as to the increase of salary had been carried out in the case of some Consuls who before were underpaid. In a short time he hoped that all the Consuls would receive fixed salaries, and would make a return of fees to the Government, but the arrangement could not be accomplished all at once. An official memorandum gave the following explanation of the consular accounts:—

"The check placed in 1861 upon consular expenditure by the new system of keeping and managing the consular accounts continues to answer admirably. We now know, which no one did before, what money will really be required, and what sum is actually used. In 1863-4, the expenditure was less than the sum voted by £11,273, and in the three years just ended we have spent less than the sum voted by £34,844. This surplus, which is created by our going on the safe principle of asking for rather more than we think absolutely necessary, reverts, under a modern financial scheme, to the Exchequer, and is re-voted as revenue. The fees levied on Government account ought also to be carried to the credit of the consular services, and the demand upon the public for the payment of those services would then be reduced to the sum which would really show the actual charge to the country. For instance, the sum paid for consular services in 1863-4 was £155,369 19s. 1d., but we collected fees amounting to £15,206 6s. 3d.; and accordingly the net charge to the public was only £140,063 12s. 10d. On the other hand, the sum voted was £166,543; and Parliament, the public, and the country have, therefore, to a certain extent, been misled into thinking the consular service for 1863-4 has cost more than it really did by £26,479 7s. 2d."

In reply to Mr. DODSON,

MR. LAYARD said, that the Governor of Labuan was also Consul General.

MR. AYRTON observed, that under the head of "United States" it was proposed to vote a sum for Consuls at Richmond, Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile. From correspondence on the table it appeared that the President of the Confederate States was extremely anxious that the Consuls who were originally appointed to the United States should remain at their posts in the Confederate States. And Lord Lyons urged very strongly upon the Foreign Office the desirableness of acceding to the view of President Davis, and he also cautioned Her Majesty's Government against taking any step that would necessarily give offence to the Government of the Confederate States. The Foreign Office, nevertheless, seemed to have gone out of its way to place these Consuls in a very invidious position, and President Davis was compelled to call upon them to leave the Confederate States. But as their salaries were to be continued till 1865, he should be glad to hear from the Under Secretary that some arrangement had been made whereby these Consuls might stay at their post to watch over British interests, and that as far as possible the differences that had arisen had been cleared up. It was important that Her Majesty's Government should reciprocate the conciliatory spirit of the Confederate Government.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he wished to know whether a Consul General was not bound to perform the duties of an ordinary Consul, and whether the Consul General at Venice was instructed to act independently of the mission at Vienna?

MR. LAYARD said, that the Consul General had commercial as well as diplomatic duties to perform. The Consul General at Venice was not independent of the embassy at Vienna.

MR. CORBALLY said, he wished to call attention to the inconvenience sustained at Rome by British subjects, who were compelled to get their passports viséd by the British Consul and to pay fees, while the Americans were under no such necessity.

MR. LAYARD said, he had written to Rome to make inquiries on the subject. He could not understand why English travellers should be put to more trouble than French and American travellers as to the visiting of passports at Rome. But as to the fees paid to the British Consul, he insisted that there was no extortion in the matter. The British Consul at Rome was kept there simply for the convenience of English travellers, and he did not see why they should object to the payment of a small fee towards supporting the Consul.

MR. AYRTON said, his experience led him to believe that English Consuls abroad rather encouraged the police to insist on travellers getting their passports viséd, whereas their duty ought to be in the contrary direction. In fact there was a combination between the Consuls and the police to get money out of British subjects abroad, who were consequently put to a great deal of trouble. He wished to know from the hon. Gentleman whether it was intended to re-appoint the British Consuls dismissed from the Confederate States, their salaries still appearing in the Estimate?

MR. LAYARD said, he could not allow the unjustifiable observations of the hon. Gentleman to pass unnoticed. Such an accusation as that made by the hon. Member against a body of English gentlemen was almost unexampled. He had accused the English Consuls—men whose character stood unimpeached—of combining with the police to obtain fees. He repudiated the accusation with indignation. It was wholly unfounded. [A laugh.] He did not see what there was to excite the laughter of the hon. Member for Dundalk. Such accusations would go abroad, and would give great pain to a body of gentlemen of high honour. If the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets made such an accusation, he was bound to give the particulars of any case he might know, so that he might institute an inquiry into it. But he did not hesitate to say that there was not a word of truth in the accusation. With regard to the Consuls who had been appointed to the Confederate States, he regretted they had been compelled to quit their posts. They had interfered to prevent British subjects from being forced to serve in the Confederate army, and for that offence had been compelled to quit the Confederate States. No arrangement had been made for their re-appointment, but meanwhile it would be unfair to stop their salaries for no fault of their own. In course of time they would no doubt receive appointments of some sort.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the burst of red-tape indignation to which the House had listened was really enough to take away one's breath, and illustrated the saying that there was only a step from the sublime to the ridiculous. As to the Consul at Rome, what use was he? He was not there for the purpose of trade, because we had no trade with Rome, and Rome was not a manufacturing or commercial city. The fact was, that the duty of the British Consul at Rome was to foment discontent among the few persons who were still discontented with the Romish Government. He said this advisedly, because the people of Rome began to find that they were paying rather less than one-tenth of the taxes paid by the population around them, while those who had placed themselves under the King of Sardinia bitterly regretted what they had done. The Consul at Rome was perfectly unnecessary; the sooner he was suppressed the better; and the British political agent there might go along with him. He compelled travellers to come to him to have their passports viséd, so that he was not only unnecessary, but mischievous.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would support the hon. Member for Dundalk if that Gentleman would follow up his remarks by moving the discontinuance of all communication with Rome.

MR. CORBALLY said, he must disclaim the desire to make any charge against the consul or other British officials at Rome; he only complained of the system under which such heavy fees were charged for the inspection of passports.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he could not agree in the propriety of keeping a consul at Rome for the mere convenience of British travellers, as the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs assigned that as the only reason for that official's presence there. It was well known that the English Government had a diplomatic representative at Rome, in the person of Mr. Odo Russell, whose services would be quite sufficient for all purposes. The presence of a consul was chiefly for commercial purposes, but as we carried on no commerce with Rome he considered that such an officer was useless there. He should, therefore, move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £400, the salary allowed him.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £400, for the Salary of the Consul at Rome, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"—(Mr. Henry Seymour.)

MR. LAYARD said, that as soon as there was a good Government in Rome there would no longer be any necessity for a British Consul in the city. It was perfectly true that Mr. Odo Russell resided at Rome, but it should be remembered that that gentleman was precluded by Act of Parliament from bearing any recognised relation to the Papal Government, and that consequently no official communication could be conveyed through him. The passports were purely a police arrangement. He would inform himself of the regulations of the Government at Rome, and if they proved to be vexatious he would do his best to remedy them.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he had been at Rome, and he did not see any advantage to be obtained by our having a consul there. There was a British vice consul at Civita Vecchia, who was paid £250 a year. He thought that the latter official might appoint an agent at Rome at a salary of £100 a year, which would be paid by English travellers, and that arrangement would meet all the wants to be satisfied by such an officer.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was anxious to express the reasons why he thought it important that England should have a consul at Rome. This country had decided that for all commercial purposes the relations of the people of the Papal States and this country should be maintained. The Act also guarded against the admission of any ecclesiastic as an accredited agent of Rome in this country. He was most anxious to maintain relations with the people of Rome upon the sole footing of diplomatic relations. He thought it would be most unwise to make any change in that respect. He would therefore support the entire Vote.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, there were £400 in the Vote for the salary of the Consul, and £100 for his office expenses. Against that Vote he saw £290. He wished to know whether it was the difference between those two items that was now asked for.

MR. LAYARD said, the £290 was, of course, paid into the Exchequer, and the amount of the salary would be reduced by so much.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to ask what the hon. Member for North Warwickshire meant by saying that the relations between the English people and the Roman people ought to be maintained. He submitted that in the appointment of a Consul at Rome, we knew nothing of the Roman people.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to maintain the salary of our Consul within the dominions of the Sovereign of the Roman States. That, he believed, was the term used in diplomatic language.

MR. WHALLEY said, he thought that the existence of a Consul at any place should be the evidence of some trade or commercial relations, but he believed the Roman Government, whether at Rome or in any other part of the world, to be inimical to all commercial interests.

MR. WHITESIDE desired to know the principle which actuated the Foreign Office in their retention of consulships. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had said that if the Roman Government were a good one there would be no Consul at Rome. He would like to know whether the Foreign Office decided upon maintaining the consulships of this country in accordance with the views which might be taken by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the excellence of the Governments of the different countries abroad.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he would beg leave to remind the noble Lord at the head of the Government of the injunction—Caveat consul ne quid respublica detrimenti capiat.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, that the consulate only cost this country about £210 a year, the remainder being met by the fees received from British residents in Rome, and tourists for services rendered to them. It would be most unwise to deprive our countrymen of the advantage of having a Consul at Rome. Whatever the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs might have said about political duties, he apprehended that the hon. Gentleman's remark was more said by way of joke than anything else.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not think that a matter of that kind ought to be allowed to pass with a joke from the Treasury Bench, but that sufficient reason ought to be shown for the maintenance of a Consul at Rome.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think my hon. Friend the Under Secretary has given very good reason for the appointment of a Consul at Rome. As to the Government being accused of passing this matter off with a joke, I think that the House has been in a greater humour for merriment than the Members sitting on the Treasury Bench. The hon. Baronet the Member for Dundalk has favoured us with his reading of the duty of a Consul. It would be hard on the Consul to apply to him practically the line, Solventur risu tabula; tu missus abibis, and to dismiss him as if it was a practical joke. What has been said by my hon. Friend is perfectly true. There are a great number of British residents at Rome, and a large number of British travellers who pass periodically through that city. Rome is a great capital. Whether it is well governed or not is a question into which I will not now enter. It is quite impossible that there should be a great European capital, frequented by British subjects, without some recognized British authority in connection with the Government of the place. Our subjects residing at Rome or visiting that capital for the purposes of instruction or pleasure, would in the absence of a Consul be exposed to great inconvenience, which I am sure this House would be sorry to be the means of inflicting upon a large number of our fellow-countrymen.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he wished to know what were Mr. Odo Russell's duties at Rome, because both he and a Consul were not wanted there. He thought the Under Secretary was throwing a shield over the British Consul that he did not require. He wished also to know what was Mr. Odo Russell's salary?

MR. ESMONDE said, that having suffered from the inconvenience of having to apply to the Consul at Rome, he wanted to know whether it was necessary that such application should be required before obtaining the police permission to leave Rome? He understood that the proceeding upon which a small fee was paid, was not necessary as regards French and Americans. The reason why the discussion had wandered into the question of our diplomatic relations with Rome was because the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had lost his temper. He thought the question might be narrowed to the necessity for a Consul which at present occasioned to travellers a delay in leaving Rome. He also wished to know if the fees were included in the salary of £290. Mr. Odo Russell held an anomalous position in Rome, and he might illustrate it by repeating a rumour that had reached him, that Mr. Odo Russell had declined to preside at a Shakesperian festival in Rome, on account of his anomalous position, he having no locus standi there.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the noble Viscount at the head of the Government was technically correct in saying that the British Consul at Rome was necessary because we had no diplomatic relations with that Court, but substantially he was in error. Mr. Odo Russell lived at Rome, had audiences with the Pope, and was in communication with Cardinal Antonelli and other authorities. If a Consul was necessary for the protection of British subjects, of what use was Mr. Odo Russell? Was that gentleman retained at Rome to make political capital—to write despatches of which the Government at home could make political capital in that or the other House of Parliament? Either Mr. Odo Russell or a Consul was unnecessary at Rome.

MR. MONSELL said, it appeared to him it was unnecessary to discuss Mr. Odo Russell's position. He certainly was in the position that he was not recognized by the Roman Government, and could not discharge the duties of a British Consul. He could not but believe that it would be a great advantage if they had a recognized Minister at Rome, and an acknowledged representative of the Roman Court in this country. The question, however, was, whether they could get rid of a person who occupied no official position there, like Mr. Odo Russell.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that a Liberal Government ought not to defend the system, which was one of the most irregular that could be conceived. The great reason why he was disposed to join in the Amendment was in the requisition made for fees. A great deal of virtuous indignation had been expressed on the Treasury Benches in the diplomatic way to which they were all accustomed, but he would say—

"O fortunatam natam me consule Romam."

MR. LAYARD said, he must remind hon. Members it was not a question of the interests of the Consul. The fees were not received for his own benefit, as they were paid into the Treasury. The Select Committee on the consular system recommended the payment of the fees. The visas were matters of police arrangements, and he was unable to say how far they were enforced. He had sent to Rome for information.

MR. WHITESIDE asked the hon. Gentleman to state what were Mr. Odo Russell's functions.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he had asked a plain question of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and he wished for an answer, namely, what were Mr. Odo Russell's duties, and what was his salary? He had not asked for the information for the purpose of opposing the Vote but for information. He wished to know how it was he was required there as well as a Consul?

MR. LAYARD said, he believed every hon. Member was well aware what Mr. Odo Russell's functions were. ["No!"] If they did not, he scarcely knew how to explain them. Mr. Odo Russell's position had been described as anomalous, and to a certain extent it was so; and because under an Act of Parliament this country could not maintain a diplomatic agent at Rome, Mr. Odo Russell held a position in the Italian embassy, but with not a very large salary. His duties were quite distinct from those of the Consul. There were, for instance, duties connected with the wills and property of British subjects which required the attention and signature of an official who was recognized by the Roman Government. These duties, which could not be performed by Mr. Odo Russell, were discharged by Mr. Severn.

MR. AYRTON observed, that the visa

had been abolished in the case of American subjects, he believed also in the case of the French, and he did not understand why it should be insisted on by the English Consul. After the extraordinary explanation which had been given by the hon. Under Secretary, who commenced by saying that every one knew the position of Mr. Odo Russell, and then confessed he could not describe his functions, they had no alternative but to divide against the Vote. The real question was, whether the Consul at Rome should not also be intrusted with the functions of Mr. Odo Russell? They had no description of what Mr. Odo Russell's duties were. The explanations from the Treasury Bench had led to so much confusion that there had been a long debate on a very small matter. If the hon. Under Secretary had given a clear and intelligible statement the debate would have ended long ago. The hon. Gentleman had been entirely carried away, if not by temper, by a very ardent imagination.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: With regard to Mr. Odo Russell, by law as it formerly stood we were precluded from having any diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome. Some years ago the House thought it desirable that the Crown should have diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome, and an Act of Parliament was passed authorizing the Crown to have those diplomatic relations. In the course of that Bill through Parliament a clause was introduced providing that no ecclesiastic should be received in this country as a diplomatic representative of the Pope. The Court of Rome took offence at that clause, and said that if they were not allowed to be represented here by an ecclesiastic, they would not be represented at all. We were obliged to submit to that decision, and, therefore, as they would not be represented here, so they said also they would not receive at Rome any accredited Minister from the Crown of England. Well, it appeared to the Government that it was almost childish that diplomatic intercourse with the Sovereign of Rome should be prevented by that question of etiquette, and accordingly the Secretary of Legation at Florence was stationed at Rome, with the consent of the Roman Government, to be the official organ of the Government with the Court of Rome; but of late years Mr. Odo Russell has been acting in that capacity. He is, unofficially I may say, the diplomatic agent of the Crown of England at Rome.

He is, as has been stated by the hon. Baronet opposite, cordially received by the Pope, to whom he has free access, and with whom he is on the best possible personal terms. Mr. Odo Russell is at Rome for these general purposes, and it is quite a mistake to suppose that he is there for any political intrigues. He is there to give us that general information which diplomatic agents do give at the Courts where they are stationed, and to carry on those communications which from time to time it is expedient to carry on with the Roman Government, but these functions are totally distinct from those performed by a Consul. The Consul could not perform the functions of Mr. Odo Russell, and Mr. Odo Russell could not perform the functions of the Consul.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, that after the full explanation of the noble Viscount he could not conceive that the Amendment could be pressed. It was as clear as possible that the distinction between the post of Mr. Odo Russell and the Consul was great. The Court of Rome did not choose to have a representative from England unless he was an ecclesiastic; but, that the Government should know politically what was going on at Rome, the Court of Rome permitted a gentleman attached to the embassy to another State to fill the post. There were those who would have no diplomatic arrangements with the Pope; there were others who were satisfied at having agents at Rome to let us know what political intrigues were going on there. He thought it desirable that we should have a person like Mr. Odo Russell at Rome. On the other hand, he thought there ought to be a Consul at Rome to assist the travellers passing through the country. The Vote was on the question of salary. A Committee of which he was a member reported in favour of a Consul, with a salary, but without fees; and he hoped the Committee would affirm their opinion. If the consular functionary elsewhere were paid by salary, why not at Rome also.

MR. J. R. ORMSBY GORE said, he wished to repeat the question which had been put, but to which no answer had been given—what was the salary received by Mr. Odo Russell?

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR asked, if there was a Consul at Florence, why his name was not inserted in the Vote?

MR. LAYARD said, it was because he was not paid.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, if that were the case he would ask, why should the Consul at Rome be paid?

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. CLAY asked for some explanation with respect to the state of the Russia Company.

MR. MONSELL said, there was a distinct understanding that no Vote should be taken after eleven o'clock.

MR. LAYARD said, he hoped the Committee would allow the Vote to pass. He would inquire as to the state of the Russia Company.

CAPTAIN JERVIS understood that the question to report Progress had been raised.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he should move that the Chairman report Progress.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Henry Seymour.)

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he really hoped that as they had discussed the Vote for two hours, the Committee would come to a decision upon it. It was not proposed that they should, after that one, take any more Votes that night.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, there were many important points still to be raised on that Vote, and among others the small amount of the fees received by the Government since the Consuls had to pay them over to the Treasury. He did not see how they were to keep down the Estimates if they did not look into these small items. The patronage connected with the Consular Department was believed to have been much abused; and a few years ago they had the case of one Consul at the Dardanelles making off with a very large sum of the public money.

MR. LAYARD said, that if the hon. Member would look at the Estimates, he would find that the amount of the consular fees had been annually increasing since 1860.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 40; Noes 111: Majority 71.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he thought it unworthy of the country to take back in fees £250 of the £500 paid to the Consul at Rome. He wished to know what the sentiments of the noble Lord at the head of the Government were on the subject; and he begged to move that the Chairman leave the chair.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Darby Griffith.)

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON observed, that at one time the salaries of Consuls were entirely defrayed out of fees levied on shipping. These fees were abolished, and only notarine fees left, the distribution was very unequal, the amount in some cases being too large, and in other cases insufficient. The Committee which sat on the subject recommended, in order to equalize the payments, that the fees be paid to the public, and Consuls be paid by fixed salaries. If fees should be abolished altogether, the public would lose the benefit of the amount. He did not see why individuals who had offices performed for them should not make some small payment for the services which they received.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Griffith) seemed to fancy that the only duty of a Consul was to take fees. Now, the duties of these officials were almost endless; and he could not understand why a small fee should not be paid by those who received the benefit of their services. If everything of that kind was to be done for nothing, the British public would be some £15,000 a year out of pocket.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES. REPORT.

Report [14th June]—Postponed Resolutions considered.

Seventh Resolution read 2°.

MR. BUTT said, he would take that occasion to call attention to the inadequate remuneration of the Special Commissioners of Irish Fisheries, especially the legal Commissioner, and to move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £1,455, the salaries and expenses of the Commissioners for Ireland. He took the course of moving the reduction, because it was only by doing so that he could raise the question which he wished to bring under the notice of the House.

Amendment proposed, to leave out “£26,647,” and insert “£25,202,”—Mr. Butt.)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That ‘£26,647’ stand part of the Resolution.”

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he must admit that the salary of the legal Commissioner was not so high as to be likely to induce a man in first-rate practice to accept the appointment. The reason of Mr. Morris's resignation was that there was an unsatisfactory feeling between him and the other two Commissioners, and he (Sir Robert Peel) put it to him that under those circumstances the commission could not work satisfactorily.

MR. ESMONDE said, in many cases the Commission had done great injustice.

MR. WHITESIDE said, the House was in some respects responsible. There were three Commissioners who had £300 a year each, and they had jurisdiction over property amounting to £300,000 a year. He was only surprised that a member of the bar would accept such a salary for such services.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that the Commissioners had decided no case under the Act of last Session. All that they had done had been under a previously existing Act.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to call attention to the insufficiency of the salaries paid to the sub-Inspectors of factories. The scheme for their increase which had been proposed by the Government had not given satisfaction, and he hoped that the Home Secretary would reconsider the matter, and would next year propose some further increase of their pay.

MR. BASS said, he entirely concurred with the noble Lord. The travelling expenses allowed to these gentlemen were much too small.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that reverting to the question of the Irish Fisheries Commission, he wished to ask whether the salary of the legal member was to be increased?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that no increase was proposed in the Vote, and none could be made without the sanction of that House.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolution agreed to.

Ninth Resolution agreed to.

Twelfth Resolution further postponed till To-morrow.

Seventy-fifth Resolution agreed to.

ELECTION PETITIONS BILL.

[BILL 17.] COMMITTEE.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that he, with the hon. Member for Peterborough, had previously made one or two attempts ineffectually to catch the Speaker's eye. Objecting very strongly to the Election Petitions Bill, which was the next order on the paper, he begged to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question put, “That this House do now adjourn.”—(Sir Francis Goldsmid)

The House divided:—Ayes 19; Noes 28: Majority 9.

SANITARY MEASURES (CAMPS, &c.).

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire, Whether it was possible, by sanitary or other measures, to mitigate some of the evils to which soldiers and sailors quartered in permanent camps, or in garrison or seaport towns, were peculiarly exposed?

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether it be possible, by sanitary or other measures, to mitigate some of the evils to which Soldiers and Sailors quartered in permanent Camps or in Garrison or Seaport Towns are peculiarly exposed, and which, impairing the efficiency and increasing the cost of the services, are known to exercise a no less injurious influence upon the health, strength, and character of the nation.”—(Sir John Trelawny.)

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, it was his intention on Monday next to bring in a Bill for the prevention of certain contagious diseases in certain naval and military stations. He proposed to ask the House to read the Bill a second time, and then refer it to a Select Committee. He should be glad if hon. Members who took an interest in the subject would serve on the Committee.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, that after the intimation of the noble Lord he would not press the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

WEST RIDING ASSIZES—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

"I have received your Address, praying that the late Decision of the Privy Council ordering the Removal of the West Riding Assizes from York to Leeds instead of to Wakefield may be reconsidered."

"I have to inform you, that in pursuance of the Provisions of an Act passed in the Third and Fourth Years of His late Majesty King William the Fourth, intituled 'An Act for the Appointment of convenient Places for the Holding of Assizes in England and Wales,' an Order was made by Me, with the Advice of My Privy Council, on the 10th Instant, ordering and directing that Assizes for the West Riding of Yorkshire shall be held at Leeds, and the 6th Day of August next has been since fixed by My Judges of Assize for the Midland Circuit for holding the next Assizes for the West Riding in that Town."

"I have directed that a Copy of this Order shall be laid before you. If it should hereafter appear, that with a view to the more cheap, speedy, and effectual Administration of Justice, it may be expedient to appoint some other Place for holding an Assize in the West Riding, the Subject shall again be referred for the Consideration and Advice of My Privy Council."

THE COUNTY COURTS AMENDMENT BILL.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I wish to claim your Lordships' attention while I speak to you a few words conveying the reasons which have induced me to request you to postpone all further consideration of the County Courts Amendment Bill, which I have had the honour to submit to you. It has been represented to me that if the Bill were now to go down to the other House of Parliament it would be impossible to pass it during the present Session, not only from the state of business — which possibly I might get over — but from the circumstance that a Committee is sitting there on the state of the bankruptcy law, with which this Bill is in a great measure connected. That is by no means the argument which has had most weight with me. I am not at all insensible to the opposition which this Bill has met with. Many representations have been made to me from various quarters; and, on the whole, I am desirous of weighing these representations and of re-considering the matter that I may endeavour, if I can, to introduce a Bill, next Session if I live, which will remove many of the objections which have been raised against this Bill. With a measure of this real importance it is hardly to be expected that it can pass through Parliament on its first introduction. It is very desirable to agitate the subject—to let the country express its opinions, to weigh those opinions, and then after mature consideration to legislate at a future time. That will be my earnest desire, and I shall therefore relieve your Lordships of any further consideration of this Bill at present.

LORD BROUGHAM expressed his satisfaction at the withdrawal of the Bill, which he thought would not only not have passed this House, but would not have passed the other. He was perfectly confident that imprisonment for debt, which was the main feature of the Bill, and the shutting up of the County Courts, which would have been the immediate consequence, would never be endured by their Lordships or the country.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE hoped that the withdrawal of the Bill would have no effect on the progress of the Irish County Courts Bill, and that some of the indisputably good provisions of this Bill would be introduced into the Irish Bill.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, as the Conference meets to-morrow, and the suspension of arms will terminate in nine days unless a final arrangement is made, this probably is the last opportunity on which it may be possible, with any chance of producing the least good, to bring under your consideration the actual position of the Danish Question. I prefer to consider great questions before any final decision is taken by the Government with respect to them, rather than to wait till that decision has been made, and then, in the event of not approving that decision, to concur in a vote of censure. I had much rather endeavour to do good, and prevent rather than punish evil. Before I put the question, of which I have given notice, to the noble Earl, I hope I may be permitted very shortly to state what is the actual position of the Danish Question and our own. The Treaty of 1852 is not the basis of the arrangement which, as we are told, it is proposed to make. It is but three years since Prince Gortschakoff, unless I am greatly mistaken, considered that treaty—agreed to by almost all the Powers of Europe—to be in the nature of a guarantee of the integrity of the Danish dominions, and, because it was assented to by so large a number of the European Powers, to be more valuable than a particular guarantee by a certain number of Powers, as was proposed by the noble Earl. That treaty was entered into for the purpose of establishing the succession to the throne of Denmark, and with it, and through it, the integrity of the Danish dominions. It was declared in that treaty that it was of the highest importance to the interests of the balance of power in Europe and the peace of Europe that the integrity of the Danish dominions should be maintained. Are there any new views with respect to the balance of power in Europe which have induced those Powers to retire from the obligations of that treaty? My Lords, it appears to me to be a matter of ominous import that a treaty agreed to only twelve years ago should, upon a futile pretence that circumstances have changed, be abandoned now by every one of the Powers by whom it was signed. Are other treaties of more ancient date, where circumstances have indeed altered, to be maintained in their integrity if this recent treaty, where circumstances have not been changed, is to be abandoned? Where is to be the security of the obligations of any treaty if so recent a treaty is to be broken? The circumstances have not changed. Then, as now, the people of Schleswig and Holstein were led by the press of Germany to believe that they would be in a better position if united with Germany; and, through the intrigues of Prussia, they rose in rebellion against their Sovereign. The same circumstances exist now. The people have not gone beyond what they did in 1848, yet the circumstances of the present dispute are relied on as a reason for depriving Denmark of Schleswig and Holstein. What effect must this have on the security of the small States of Europe? If the great Powers unite to dismember a State by taking from it that which is declared by treaty to be a permanent portion of it, what occurs to-day with respect to Denmark may occur to-morrow with respect to Sweden, with respect to Holland, with respect to Belgium, and with respect to Switzerland, but still more with respect to those mediæval curiosities the small States of Germany, which, if this innovation be carried out, probably, will be the very first States to suffer from its further application. My Lords, I expect that when we read the papers which have passed in this Conference we shall find on the part of the noble Earl a very able statement of the reasons why this course should not be adopted. We have all read with a feeling of sympathy that paper which appeared a few days ago stating the views of Denmark with respect to the proposals made at the Conference. Denmark bows to the opinion of the Powers, and consents to adopt the proposal of the noble Earl with respect to the line of demarcation, but with the conditions that her diminished territory shall be preserved to her in independence and autonomy, and that the people whom it is proposed to separate from Denmark shall have the opportunity of expressing their own opinions as to their future government. Now, what are the different lines of demarcation proposed? The German Powers proposed a line from Apenrade to Tondern, which would leave the Danes only a very small portion of Schleswig. It is also stated, though not on strictly official authority, that a second line was proposed by Prussia—one from Flensburg to Tondern. This latter would leave the Danes in possession of Alsén, which the Prussians and Austrians have not hitherto been able to take. The first line would take Alsén away from Denmark; but there is this to be observed with respect to both lines—that they would deprive Denmark of every port in the North Sea, and by doing so they would cut off her communication with the other States of Europe in winter, when the Sound cannot be passed. I believe that France as little as England could consent to such an arrangement as that. The noble Earl proposes a different line. He proposes a line that would leave Denmark the Dannewerke, and I believe all the neutral Powers have accepted and supported the noble Earl's proposition. I hold, then, that the noble Earl on the part of this country and the neutral Powers, by the support they have given to his propositions, have practically pledged themselves in honour to maintain that frontier line, and not consent to any other which may be proposed. When, by means of this proposition, they replace the flag of Denmark on the line of the Dannewerke, they incur an obligation in honour to maintain it there. And they could not have selected a frontier more agreeable to good policy. To take from Denmark anything above the Dannewerke would have this effect—that in any future war between Germany and Russia, or between France and Germany, France or Russia would be sure to have the cordial support of Denmark against Germany, and troops could be brought to bear on the right of the German army in a manner that would be well calculated to insure success against Germany. We ought to look to the settlement now proposed as a final one, and no settlement can be final which is not at the same time just and honourable. I can hardly think it possible that Austria can hesitate about accepting the noble Earl's proposition. She must surely admit that the position she has lately taken up of subordinate co-operation with Prussia is one not worthy of the place which she has hitherto occupied in Europe. She must feel that the objects which Prussia has in view are not German, but purely Prussian objects, and, therefore, that they are not her own objects. She must see that Prussia is adopting principles which are entirely incompatible with the integrity of any of the States of Europe. And may we not hope that Russia will give her strenuous support to the noble Earl's proposition—Russia, which for ninety years has honourably and generously supported Denmark? It is surely to be expected that, looking back on that long series of years, Russia will not, in the moment of her weakness and difficulty, desert Denmark, whom she has so long supported. And what should be the course of France? Denmark through her long and faithful connection and alliance with France during the revolutionary war, lost Norway. Is it possible to believe France can stand by and see Denmark, her ancient friend and ally, dismembered and disabled by that very State on which she trampled at Jena? Must France not feel that a treaty concluded by her consent which would dismember and destroy Denmark would bring upon herself a dishonor greater than that of the defeat at Rosbach, which at Jena she had redeemed. Then, what are the rights which the German Powers claim in this case? The right of conquest. The conqueror has no right of conquest in an unjust war. He has as little as the house-breaker who enters a dwelling at night to despoil it. But the conqueror in an unjust war, though he cannot acquire a right can confer one. He confers upon all States the right of intervention to redress a wrong and re-establish rightful possession. Again, my Lords, will any one maintain the broad doctrine that every man who speaks German is to be under a German Sovereign?

Why, that is a principle which would dismember every State in Europe. There is no country, including our own, in which there are not thousands of men who speak a language different from that of the Government under which they live. I do not ask, under present circumstances, what England intends to do; but I infer that at least the Government will go to this extent, that they will not permit an Austrian fleet to enter the Baltic. I think they will interfere to protect Denmark in the possession of her Islands. But what greater right have the inhabitants of those Islands to be protected from Prussian barbarity than have the people of the north of Schleswig and Jutland? Depend upon it, the Prussians would prefer an arrangement of this kind to any peace; they would prefer to be kept out of the Islands if they were allowed to remain in Schleswig and Jutland; and they would remain and barbarously despoil the inhabitants of those provinces. But is that consistent with the honour of this country and with the honour of the other States of Europe? There is only one way to make Prussia give up its hold on Jutland and North Schleswig, and that is by distinctly intimating that the British Government will not only protect the Islands but will protect Jutland and Schleswig—that they will give the assistance of a British force to blockade the ports of Germany in order to protect Schleswig and Jutland. I certainly have always maintained the opinion that there is no material difference between the moral obligations of a State and those of an individual. I cannot understand how that which confers reputation on a man can bring discredit and injury upon a country. I think that no country can greatly err in following the dictates of generosity and of honour in making timely preparations against a great and coming danger, and least of all when innocence and weakness clasp its knees imploringly, in raising its hand to restrain and to strike down the aggressor. It now only remains for me to ask the noble Earl whether measures have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to re-inforce the fleet, so as to make it equal at once to the blockade of the German ports and the defence of the Danish Islands.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, before I reply to the Question of the noble Earl, I must beg leave to make a very few remarks upon the statement which he has just addressed to your Lordships. Of course, I am not going to enter into anything that has taken place in the Conference or into the state of the negotiations at the present moment; but as the noble Earl has referred to the Treaty of 1852, as he is perfectly aware of the nature of that treaty, and as he has had before him the papers which have been laid upon the table of both Houses of Parliament, I must call his attention to some of the circumstances connected with that treaty. My Lords, the Treaty of 1852 was not a treaty of guarantee. I believe it was stated expressly at the time, and this I know from one who negotiated the treaty, that it was then a matter of discussion whether there should be a treaty of guarantee, or only a treaty recognizing the right of the King of Denmark to regulate the succession to the throne, and stating the reasons why the Powers of Europe should agree to the mode proposed by the King of Denmark for regulating that succession. That treaty bound, I think, all the Powers who signed it, to recognize the present Sovereign of Denmark, King Christian IX., both as successor to the throne of Denmark and to that of the Duchies, and thereby he became, at the death of the late King, Duke of Holstein, Duke of Schleswig, and Duke of Lauenburg, as much as he became King of Denmark. That was the obligation of the treaty; but it did not do more than that which I have stated; it did not bind any of the Powers who signed it to guarantee its execution. It was no more than those Treaties of 1815, one of which provided for the union of Belgium with Holland, and another for the possession of Lombardy by the House of Austria. The noble Earl will probably recollect that at the commencement of this discussion in the present year the French Government, in a State paper—which was at all events contained in the newspapers, and which, I think, was laid before Parliament—referred to the Treaty of 1815 with respect to Belgium, as showing that this country, though it did agree to that treaty, and though it might be unwilling to see it disturbed, yet concurred in arrangements differing from that which was provided in 1815. In a similar manner, when there was a question of war for the purpose, among other things, of separating Lombardy from Austria, no person was more emphatic than the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury), who then held the office of Foreign Secretary, in advising Austria not to incur the perils of war, and in declaring that this country intended to be neutral in such a contest, and would not feel herself bound to support Austria in the maintenance of her Italian possessions. There are many more papers than those presented to Parliament, all to the same effect. I think they do the greatest honour to the noble Earl, and that they are conceived in a spirit of wise policy. The noble Earl who introduced this subject (the Earl of Ellenborough) must be aware of the sentiments both of France and Russia with respect to the maintenance of the Treaty of 1852—how explicitly France has stated her determination not to go to war for the purpose of maintaining that treaty, and how, though not so explicitly, Russia clearly let it be perceived that it was not her intention to take up arms to enforce that treaty. Whether that be any justification for the course which the Government of this country has pursued is another question, and it is a question upon which I may hereafter have to address your Lordships. I can assure your Lordships that it is a great inconvenience, as well as a great disadvantage to Her Majesty's Government, that they have not been able hitherto to lay before Parliament an explanation of the course of their policy; and no one will more rejoice than I shall when I am able to lay the protocols of the Conference upon the table of this House, and to explain to your Lordships the course which Her Majesty's Government have pursued. In the meantime, in order to show the sort of misrepresentations which are current with respect to the course pursued by the Government, I may mention that in an article which, I believe, was first contained in a German journal, but which I saw translated into a French paper, and there commented upon, it was stated that Her Majesty's Government had declared that the Duchy of Holstein and any part of Schleswig that might be separated from Denmark ought not to be disposed of without the consent of the British Plenipotentiary and the Government of Great Britain. Now, the declaration really was that, whatever might happen, the future destinies of the two countries should not be disposed of without their own consent; and as I suppose that was a very fair and just proposal, those who wish to malign England on every occasion thought it well to pervert the meaning of this expression, and turn the consent of the Duchies themselves into the consent of the British Plenipotentiary. I will not enter any further into this question, but nothing will be more agreeable to the Government than to give a full explanation of the whole course of their policy upon this matter. With regard to the Question asked by the noble Earl, I must say that during a period of negotiation, and while the Conference still continues, it has rather the air of drawing from me a statement as to our preparations for war. I will, therefore, only state, disclaiming any intention of uttering a threat of any kind, that Her Majesty's fleet is fully prepared for any service which it may be called upon to render.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, concurring, as I do, with a great portion of the observations which have been made by my noble Friend (the Earl of Ellenborough), and made with his usual force and eloquence, I cannot but say with great respect that I certainly dissent, in some degree, from a proposition which he laid down in commencing his speech, and which appears to me to involve a considerable constitutional error. My noble Friend stated that his object was—and there could be no doubt what his object must be—to prevent evil being done and assist in promoting beneficial results rather than to allow matters to take their own course, and then censure those who are responsible. Now, if you could be perfectly certain that the interference of Parliament upon all occasions during the progress of negotiations and during the communications which are passing between various countries would have the effect of preventing evil, of promoting good, and of giving to Her Majesty's Government the support which they may need under the circumstances of the case, I should say that such intervention by Parliament, although exceptional, might at the same time be justified. But, as a general rule, I lay down a doctrine entirely different from that propounded by my noble Friend. I conceive the true principle to be, that while matters are in progress—while the Government are engaged in negotiation—it is not the duty of Parliament, with imperfect information, to interfere by advice or by vote. I am of opinion that with Her Majesty's Government in all matters of this kind must be left the exclusive responsibility for the course and issue of negotiation; and I hope I may take this opportunity of expressing my earnest anxiety, that if I have refrained during the whole of this Session—as I have refrained—from passing any opinion, from putting any question, from raising any partial discussion—a course which I thought greatly to be deprecated—that abstinence on my part will not be supposed to arise from indifference, still less from approval, of the course pursued by the Government. My Lords, whatever temptations I may have felt to enter upon partial discussions of that state of Europe—more especially as connected with the Danish Question—which keeps this country in feverish anxiety from day to day, I have laid down for myself a rule from which I have not shrunk and will not shrink—namely, that while matters are in their present state, I will not afford the slightest excuse for any man to allege that by anything I have said or done I have in the least degree embarrassed or impeded the action of the Government. I will leave to them, according, as I apprehend, to the constitutional duty of Parliament, the whole and undivided responsibility for the course which they have pursued, and the condition to which they have brought the honour of the country. But, my Lords, I must at the same time say that the time is approaching when this transition state of things cannot long continue—that a few days must decide whether the Conference is to succeed in promoting a peace, and, above all, an honourable peace, for this country. Dearly as I love peace I love honour more, and the time must come when we shall see whether that happy effect is to be produced by the negotiations carried on by Her Majesty's Government, or whether, in the course of a few days, the hopes of Europe will be dashed to the ground, the war recommenced, the negotiations ended, and the whole question left open, as it was previous to the assembling of the Conference. Should that be the case, I say it will not only be the right but the duty of Parliament, without an hour's delay, to call upon the Government for a distinct and specific statement of the policy which they have pursued and the course which they mean to pursue. Nay, more—I say it will be the right and the duty of Parliament, upon hearing such a statement, to pronounce judgment, "Aye" or "No," upon the policy of the Government and the position in which they have placed the country. We are now advancing to a very late period of the Session, and I think it is of the utmost importance that Parliament should not separate without having an opportunity of expressing its opinions before this Conference has come to a determination as to the course which is to be pursued, be it for peace or for war. And notwithstanding what I have said as to not interfering with the course of Her Majesty's Government while negotiations are in progress, I may say that I think Parliament would not—indeed, I think Parliament ought not—patiently to sit by and watch protracted negotiations delayed by postponements and adjournments day after day and week after week, until a time of the year shall arrive when Parliament will not be able to pronounce effectively any opinion of a judicial character upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers. Therefore, while I earnestly hope that by a speedy settlement of this question one way or the other, the lips of Parliament will be opened, and Parliament will be permitted to express its opinion, I think it my duty at the same time to say that if, contrary to my hopes and belief, negotiations should be carried on from week to week, and from month to month, without leading to any definite issue, that circumstance will entirely alter our position, and it will be competent and justifiable—nay more, it will be necessary—that Parliament should take some course to prevent its voice from being entirely stifled in respect to the great affairs of Europe.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he could not remain silent when he heard such constitutional doctrine as this laid down by the noble Earl. He agreed that it would be indiscreet at the present time, when a Conference was sitting to consider affairs so important, that Parliament should interpose any opinion upon the great questions at issue; but he denied that because negotiations were going on it was necessarily incompetent or injudicious, on the part of Parliament, to seek for information. Such was not the doctrine laid down and acted upon by high authorities upon constitutional procedure, which the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary surely would not hesitate to acknowledge. Had not Earl Grey, Mr. Fox, and others, over and over again moved Resolutions and Addresses to the Throne while negotiations were going on? It was often only when negotiations had commenced that Parliament became aware that questions of peace or war were pending. He maintained that since Parliament had assembled there had been many opportunities when Parliament, without any risk of doing harm and with great prospect of doing good, might have considered the course which the honour and interests of this country required to be pursued at the present time. They had been told in the Speech from the Throne, that the Treaty of 1852 was to be upheld. What had become of that treaty now? No one speaks of it, and it is entirely put on one side. Without saying whether that was right or not, he would ask their Lordships to remark how it had been justified by his noble Friend in reply to the frequent remarks of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough). The noble Earl the Foreign Secretary referred to other treaties which had been set aside, and alluded to them not as exceptional instances, but rather as examples, implying that as so many treaties had been disregarded there would be no harm in breaking one or two more. The observations of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough) were, he thought, most wise and well deserving of their Lordships' consideration; but the question which he had put, and which perhaps it was as well had not been answered, seemed to be founded upon a misconception. The noble Earl had jumped at the conclusion, that under some circumstances the Government would be inclined to go to war upon the question. It was hard to see what grounds the noble Earl had for thinking that, happen what might, the present Government would ever be induced to take up arms in the cause of Denmark. It was a matter of notoriety that propositions for partitioning the kingdom of Denmark had been entertained by our Ministers, and no one could doubt that events were tending towards a total extinction of the kingdom of Denmark. He would not say whether such a result was desirable or not for this country, but there could be no doubt that there was a great probability that within a few years Denmark would either become a part of the German Empire, or a portion of a Scandinavian kingdom. These things had been going on, and we had not stirred in the matter, and therefore it was difficult to understand how it was that the noble Earl assumed that in any case we should go to war for Denmark. If a Vote of Censure were proposed, and Parliament was left without information, it would be difficult to say in what manner their Lordships would vote. He believed that if Parliament had interfered in 1853 there would have been no Russian war, and he had always regretted that he had not at that time brought forward a Motion which would have enabled Parliament by an expression of its opinion to relieve the country from the misfortunes of that war.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, in reply to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) I must render my tribute of thanks to him for the course he has pursued in this matter—a course which is entirely constitutional, fair to the Government, and creditable to himself. With respect to the noble Earl's remarks as to the silence of the Government, I may say that I think that in a very few days either arrangements will have been made for preliminaries of peace, or the negotiations will have been totally broken off, and the war will then of course be resumed.

THE BURIAL SERVICE.—QUESTION.

LORD EBURY, in rising to put the Question of which he had given notice as to the probability of legislation this Session upon the compulsory use of the Burial Service, said, he did not intend to enter upon any discussion of this subject at present. He called the attention of the House last year to the Question, and proposed to address Her Majesty for the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into the evils which were stated to arise from the compulsory and indiscriminate use of the Burial Service. In support of the Motion he referred the House to a petition signed by about 4,000 ministers of the Church of England, and addressed to the heads of the Church, praying that some relief might be afforded to their consciences by removing the grievous scandals caused by the present state of the law. Upon that occasion the most rev. Primate urged him to withdraw the Motion in order that the representatives of the Church might further consider the subject. He did accordingly withdraw his Motion. Before doing so, however, his most rev. Friend the Primate undertook for himself and his right rev. Brethren that they would give their serious attention to the subject, and ascertain, if possible, the views and feelings of the clergy in reference to it, and, if possible, devise some means of remedying an admitted grievance. At the same time he stated that he would not pledge himself—indeed, he did not think it practicable to do so during that Session. Before the Session terminated he asked his most rev.

Friend whether anything had been done; and the most rev. Primate stated on that occasion that he had already taken some steps in the matter, but that he would require more time in order to ascertain what were the sentiments of the clergy on the subject. Since that time the greatest part of a year had elapsed. The present Session was now fast drawing to a close, and he hoped he should not be considered as manifesting any improper impatience if he ventured to ask his most rev. Friend, Whether it was likely that any Legislation will take place this Session to remedy the evils complained of from the compulsory and indiscriminate use of the Burial Service? Should the answer be in the negative, it was his intention on this day fortnight to bring the whole Question again under the notice of the House.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, his noble Friend had stated very accurately what passed during the last Session of Parliament on the question of the Burial Service. It was quite true that he (the Archbishop of Canterbury) undertook to endeavour to devise some measure which should remedy the grievance which he acknowledged to exist; but before doing so he stated that he ought to ascertain what were the views of his right rev. Brethren, and the views of the clergy of the United Church of England and Ireland. He thought he might say that the majority of his right rev. Brethren were averse to any change in the Burial Service. He had taken great pains to ascertain the views of the clergy on the subject, and the preponderating majority, amounting to at least three-fourths—perhaps four-fifths—were also averse to any change in that service. Their feeling was that the remedy would be worse than the disease, and that it would be better to submit to present evil than run the greater risks that might follow from any change. That being the case, he certainly did not feel himself at all prepared to propose any such remedy for the grievance complained of. He should not be justified in doing so contrary, he believed, to the views of the majority of his right rev. Brethren, certainly to the opinion of an immense preponderance of the clergy. His noble Friend had not touched on the merits of the Question, and he should not, therefore, enter upon it on this occasion, but he should be prepared to meet him when he renewed his Motion.

Lord EBURY then gave notice that on this day fortnight he would renew the Motion he made upon this subject last Session.

CHURCH SERVICES (APOCRYPHA)

BILL—(No. 125.)

SECOND READING. BILL WITHDRAWN.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

VISCOUNT GAGE moved the second reading of the Bill, the object of which was to permit clergymen to substitute for the lessons from the Apocrypha, now used on certain days in the Church service, lessons from the canonical books of the Bible. This might seem a slight boon, but slight as it was, it would be no small relief to many clergymen whose consciences revolted at reading the books to which the Bill referred. As to the Books of the Apocrypha, they had never been received in the Church previous to the Council of Trent, and then only because they were found in the Bible.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>.—(Viscount Gage.)

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY was certainly not prepared to accept the Bill his noble Friend proposed to read a second time. He thought it extremely objectionable—unwelcome to the laity and unacceptable to the Church—that it should be left to the option of any clergyman to read what lessons he pleased. He therefore moved as an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Six Months").

EARL STANHOPE said, he would point out to his noble Friend the fact that while the object of the Bill was to take care that no part of the Apocrypha should form part of the service of the Church of England, and while permission was given to substitute canonical lessons for those taken from the Apocrypha, the Bill would not be effectual for its purpose, because there were other portions of the service—the Offertory, for instance—in which portions of the Apocrypha were used.

Lord EBURY observed, that the Bill only proposed that violence should not be done to the consciences of those clergymen who were compelled to read lessons from the Apocrypha fixed for particular days. There were portions of the Apocrypha—such as the story of Susannah and the Elders and Bel and the Dragon—which were totally unfit, he would not say to be read in church, but to form any part of Christian worship. A clergyman had informed him that he would as soon read the story of Jack and the Bean Stalk as that of Bel and the Dragon. Many clergymen did substitute other lessons, but unless the law was altered clergymen would still be compelled by law to read these unseemly stories. All that the Bill proposed was, that clergymen might be allowed, without violation of the law, to select lessons out of the Canonical Scriptures, instead of reading those taken from the Apocrypha. It was not to be supposed that any layman would object to that. The laity, he was persuaded, would rather hail it with satisfaction. The first thing which Dissenters and unbelievers charged against the Church of England was, that it sanctioned the public reading of these objectionable lessons; and that practice had done more harm to the Church than almost anything else in her ordinances. If their Lordships were true friends to that Church of which they were almost all members, they would vote unanimously in favour of the noble Viscount's Motion.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he was afraid there was some danger of the right rev. Bench being misunderstood in that matter. By his own vote he would be exceedingly sorry to be supposed to express an opinion either in favour of the use of the Apocrypha or against it, or an opinion either in favour of the abstract proposition of the noble Viscount, that the clergy should have this liberty, or that they should not have it. What he wished to be understood as saying by the vote he meant to give was, that he thought this grievance, if it was a grievance which required to be remedied, had better be remedied in some other way. The noble Lord (Lord Ebury) had intimated that he would call their Lordships' attention to the subject of the Burial Service a fortnight hence. Now, even with regard to that subject he was disposed to think it was not the wisest course to have discussions in that House till such time as they were able to settle other important questions with which they were at present engaged. The Government had issued a Commission of Inquiry into a very important ecclesiastical matter—namely, the subscriptions of the clergy at their ordination and their institution to benefices; and he thought he should not be guilty of any breach of confidence in saying that that Commission had been sitting since April last for many hours in each week. And, as the right rev. Prelates who were members of that Commission, and who, he supposed, would also be members of the other Commission, had many important duties to perform, it was perhaps better to take one thing at a time. When the question of clerical subscription had been dealt with in the proper and constitutional way, they might be able to consider any further improvements which noble Lords had to suggest. As to the Apocrypha, he did not think that everything which might be disliked in the lessons read in Church was contained in the Apocryphal lessons. Some of their greatest divines had prized the Apocrypha. If his memory served him rightly, Bishop Butler's use of the Book of Jesus the Son of Sirach showed certainly that the Apocrypha, as a whole, had not been correctly designated by the noble Lord. But however this might be, it was better to adopt such a course as the Church generally approved for removing any blemishes which might exist in our ecclesiastical system.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD desired to back up what had been said by his right rev. Brother. Without expressing any opinion on the general proposition of the noble Viscount, he submitted that the Bill ought not to be read the second time, because it was, at all events, a wrong mode of doing what the noble Lord proposed to do. Following all the precedents of the Constitution, the proper mode of attempting such a step as this would be by moving an Address to the Crown, calling on the Crown either by Commission to inquire into it, or by addressing the Crown to bring the matter by its prerogative before the Houses of Convocation; and, the matter having been first considered in a Convocation of the clergy, it might then be proposed that it should be brought before Parliament. That had hitherto been the course adopted, and he thought it would be full of the gravest inconvenience in many ways if that old constitutional method were rudely interfered with by individual Members of the Legislature attempting piecemeal to reform what they might deem little blemishes in the Church services. Another objection to this proposal was, that if this subject were to be considered at all, the question should be, not whether the Apocryphal lessons could be amended, but whether the lectionary of the Church service could be amended. He ventured to join his own protest to what had fallen from his right rev. Brother as to the exceeding inappositeness of the general and strong censure pronounced by his noble Friend on the Apocryphal Books. He admitted that there were blemishes to be found in them, and parts that were not the best adapted for reading in our churches; but if, instead of listening to clerical correspondents, who were occasionally not very clerical in their language, the noble Lord would read The Wise Sayings of Jesus the Son of Sirach, the noble Lord would perhaps not be a sadder, but, by his own confession, would certainly be a wiser man.

LORD EBURY explained that he had referred to such books as Susannah and the Elders and Bel and the Dragon.

LORD LYTTTELTON objected to dealing in the fragmentary manner now proposed with the English Prayer Book without due inquiry, conducted in the regular methods. So far, however, from objecting to the principle in itself of the noble Viscount's Bill, he thought it might be carried a great deal further. No case could be mentioned of more flagrant faults of omission and commission than that of the lectionary of the English Church, whether they looked to the Sunday lessons or to the calendar for the weekly services. When the noble Lord spoke of things in the Apocrypha which it was painful to read in the presence of ladies, it should be remembered that a similar objection might be made to some parts of the canonical books of the Old Testament.

EARL GRANVILLE ventured to suggest to the noble Viscount (Viscount Gage) that he should not divide the House on that occasion. It was quite clear, from what had just taken place, that the House was not prepared to assent to the second reading of the Bill; and he hoped the Motion would not be pressed, as, at the same time, it might be disagreeable to many of their Lordships to vote against it.

VISCOUNT GAGE said, the discussion had convinced him that the proper mode of dealing with the subject was by the appointment of a Commission, and he would not press the second reading of the Bill.

Amendment, and original Motion (by Leave of the House), withdrawn; and Order of the Day for the Second Reading discharged.

PENAL SERVITUDE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 66.)—REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, he desired to call attention to the manner in which the Bill was likely to effect the voluntary emigration of convicts released on licence. As regarded this question there were two points of very great interest and importance, which came out strongly in the evidence before the Commissioners—first, the extent to which the emigration of ticket-of-leave men had up to the present time been carried; and secondly, the beneficial results which had attended it. Sir Walter Crofton stated, that upwards of 20 per cent of those convicts who were released on licence in Ireland during the six years ending in 1861, had emigrated. But those figures, large as they were, did not represent the whole numbers, because Sir Walter Crofton could only speak with respect to those persons whose movements he had traced. The information with regard to England was not so good, but there could be no doubt that considerable numbers of convicts had emigrated from this country as well as from Ireland. According to the secretary of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society that institution, since it came into existence, had assisted about 900 released convicts to emigrate, and that a still larger number would have been assisted had the society's funds permitted; and the same authority stated that a very general disposition to leave this country had been found among ticket-of-leave men. As to the beneficial effects of the emigration there was a concurrence of testimony on the part of all who had given evidence before the Commissioners. Sir Walter Crofton was of opinion that any well-directed system of prison discipline must involve a large voluntary emigration of released convicts; and Mr. Organ declared that the main object of his lectures had been to induce ticket-of-leave men to emigrate. Looking indeed to the large extent to which emigration had gone from Ireland, and looking to the great importance that had been attached to the Irish system, it was not too much to say that the good working of the Irish system might be attributed, in great measure, to the voluntary emigration of convicts released on licence. With regard to transportation the Commissioners were sensible of the difficulties of the question, and to meet those difficulties they recommended a large increase in the emigration to Western Australia—as large a number as the colony could accommodate. Captain Henderson stated the number at 1,000 a year; the Commissioners in their Report estimated the number somewhat larger; but it was known that the average of those transported during the last two years had been between 500 and 600 each year. This was not the time to discuss the question whether the Government were acting rightly or not. He thought they were acting rightly. They had now pledged themselves that no greater number of convicts should be transported to Australia than between 500 and 600, and that pledge, he thought, could not be revoked. What was to be done with the remainder? It appeared to him that it would be acting more in the spirit of the recommendation of the Commission, if they could not carry out those recommendations to the letter, not to throw obstacles in the way of voluntary emigration of convicts who had been released from prison. Now, what would be the position of the Government if the Bill passed in its present form? The Bill provided for a stringent supervision of ticket-of-leave men, who were to report themselves once a month, besides intimating every change of residence. These reports would be sent in the first instance to the directors of convict prisons, and would then be transmitted by them to the Government, who would thus be made responsible for the movements and conduct of all convicts released on licence. It was also important to note what had been the action of other countries, especially of those towards which the tide of emigration usually tended—the United States of America and our Australian colonies. The State of New York had framed a most stringent regulation for the purpose of preventing persons whose term of punishment had not expired from being landed on its shores. They made the shipowner responsible—they visited him with severe penalties if he allowed any of these men to land. Of course, the Government would not deny the right of the United States to make such a regulation a cause of grievance. But in the case of our own colonies it was still stronger. After the concessions which the Government had made to the colonies, he could not believe that they would be so wanting in self-respect as to attempt to smuggle convicts into the colonies. If the Bill were passed as it stood, it would hamper the Government very greatly in dealing with a large class of our convicts. No doubt the Government might deal in this way with the class of convicts whose term of imprisonment having expired, and who having had a chance of gaining honest employment offered to them here or elsewhere, could be shown to have declined availing themselves of such a chance; but if an impression should ever prevail in the public mind that these men were the victims of a system that would give rise to a most dangerous state of feeling—sympathy with the convict class. He had shown that a very considerable emigration of criminals had taken place, that it had been beneficial, and that this Bill would put a stop to it. He hoped the Government, therefore, would consider whether the Bill could not be so modified as to give the Secretary of State power to release convicts, if he thought fit, without imposing any conditions of supervision.

EARL GRANVILLE admitted that there was an inconsistency between the Bill and the Report of the Commissioners—that the Commissioners had stated that Western Australia was capable of receiving 1,000 convicts a year, whereas the Government were only permitted to send 500 or 600.

EARL GREY said, it was impossible to overstate the importance of enabling convicts to leave this country, and he entirely concurred with his noble Friend (the Earl of Airlie), that while it was most desirable that convicts should be enabled to leave the country, it certainly was not desirable that we should send them away in an underhand and stealthy manner. The noble Earl had pointed out that several foreign countries and some of our colonies had passed laws to prevent the immigration of such a class, and he could not help fearing that if Her Majesty's Government pursued their present policy on this subject we should get into serious difficulties, both with our colonies and foreign countries. At present convicts sent to Western Australia had very little chance of making their way to the other Australian colonies; but he had no hesitation in saying that if convicts were released here with tickets-of-leave, but under no conditions which would prevent them making their way to the colonies, the Australian colonies would get a larger importation of this class than if we had continued to send them to Western Australia. He dissented altogether from the assertion of the noble Lord that the Government having decided on not sending more than 500 or 600 convicts to Western Australia in each year, this decision of the Government was irrevocable. He never would admit that an unwise decision was to be binding on the wisdom of Parliament to all future time, and he hoped no long time would elapse before Parliament overruled this unwise and hasty measure.

EARL GRANVILLE said, Her Majesty's Government were quite alive to the complaints which our colonies and foreign Governments would have against us if we deluged them with our convict classes.

Clause 4 (Forfeiture of Licence).

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD rose to move an Amendment the effect of which was to relieve the ticket-of-leave men from the obligation of reporting themselves once a month to the police, unless they were required so to do by the conditions of their licence. The mere fact of a man calling upon the police once a month would not give them any further check upon him than the ordinary supervision which they ought under all circumstances to exercise. He contended that it would be impracticable to carry out the clause as it stood, and that it would be hard to deprive the few men who were inclined to earn an honest living from a fair opportunity of doing so, especially as there was nothing to show that the public would be better protected under such a system.

Amendment moved, after ("subsequently") to leave out ("once in each month") and insert ("if required to do so by the Conditions of his License").

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that every argument that had been urged by the noble Earl had been urged over and over again on a former evening. If the Amendment was agreed to it would completely reverse the deliberate decision arrived at by their Lordships after a full discussion. The objection to supervision was its hardship upon the ticket-of-leave holder. He was willing to assent to the introduction of a proviso that the personal attendance of the ticket-of-leave holder should not be required after the first occasion, but that a certificate or letter from the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society, or a clergyman, or an employer, should be received as evidence of the man's continuance in honest courses.

EARL GRANVILLE observed, that nothing had been said to show that a monthly reporting would insure a greater amount of supervision on the part of the police, than reporting upon first arrival and upon each change of residence.

[BILL 55.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. BAGWELL said, he wished to bring under the notice of the House the condition of the needlewomen and tailors of the metropolis. Last year the community were startled by the case of an unfortunate needlewoman who met her death in London. She had been in the employment of Madame Elise, one of the fashionable dressmakers of the metropolis, and her death was accelerated by working in an ill-ventilated room. At the time of the occurrence the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in reply to a question asked in the House, said he should be glad if something could be done by Parliament in reference to the ventilation of these buildings and workrooms. Twelve months had elapsed since the unfortunate occurrence to which he alluded, and nothing had yet been done. He (Mr. Bagwell), therefore, thought the Government ought to state what were their intentions. If they were not prepared to introduce a Bill that Session, one might be introduced early in the next Session. The Act which was passed in the year before the last regulating bakehouses had worked most beneficially, and a similar measure in regard to the ventilation of the workrooms of needlewomen and tailors was highly desirable. In conclusion he would move that the Committee be instructed to take into consideration the propriety of including in the Bill the tailors and needlewomen of the metropolis, and of towns containing more than 5,000 inhabitants by the last census.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that a Commission had been appointed to examine into the state of those trades, and it would be unadvisable to legislate upon the subject until that Commission had made its Report. He could make no distinct pledge upon the subject, but he hoped his hon. Friend would be satisfied that the Government would give the matter the earliest attention possible.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the instruction suggested by the hon. Member was not one that could be sent to the Committee, as the hon. Member had not given notice of his Motion. He must, therefore, request the hon. Member to withdraw it.

MR. BAGWELL said, he would withdraw his Motion. He was perfectly satisfied with what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to Clause 3 (Definitions).

MR. ADDERLEY said, he regarded the mode of specifying those provisions of the Factory Acts to which the Bill was to extend as not only unadvisable but dangerous. The House should avoid the danger of cobweb legislation as far as possible. The plan was mischievous, as the House itself could not be fully aware of the extent of its legislation.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, the provisions of the Factory Acts were perfectly familiar having been administered for many years, and he was satisfied that no practical difficulty would arise from the application of them. He might add that they had received an assurance from the Inspector of the district that he would be able with his sub-Inspectors to carry the measure into effect, but the number of Inspectors would be increased if necessary.

There was no reason why the precaution of fencing machinery adopted in other factories should be dispensed with in this case. He did not intend to ask the House to consider the Report until Monday week with the view of giving ample time for the consideration of the subject.

Mr. F. S. POWELL said, he wished to call attention to a recent case which had come before the magistrates. A factory in which the provisions of the Factory Act had been violated, was proved to be situated in two counties. It having been ascertained that the process carried on in the county in which the proceedings had been instituted was not in contravention of the Act, the prosecution failed. He trusted that if the Government contemplated any Consolidation Act, which had been hinted at, the anomaly to which he referred would be provided for.

Schedule (Manufactures and Employments to which Act applies).

Mr. H. A. BRUCE said, he wished to move the omission of the clause which included in the operation of the Act persons engaged in the employment of finishing, hooking, lapping, making up, or packing. The Government had been guided in framing the clauses by the state of the trade at Manchester. Information, however, from other places had been received, stating that the hours were not excessive, and that no women and children, to whom the clauses of the Act could be applied, were employed in any injurious portion of the businesses. The Government ought not to interfere in such cases unless there was ample cause for such interference, and even in Manchester there appeared to be no pressing call for interference. The state of all those trades, however, should be fully examined into, and all he asked of the Committee was not to force the Government against their sense of justice to legislate without further inquiry.

Mr. ROEBUCK said, that the contest was between men who wished to advance the interests of the working classes and those who from selfish motives desired to employ them; a contest which had been carried on in that House for the last forty years. Legislation in favour of the working classes had been opposed at every step by the manufacturers. The first step was taken by his lamented friend Joseph Hume, who required that the power of combination should be granted to the working man, and that step was at last carried in spite of the most virulent opposition on the part of the manufacturers. It was then felt that the children of the manufacturing classes were subject to much ill-treatment, and not until the manufacturers were actually ashamed of their conduct did they cease their opposition to any improvement in that direction. Then came the question as to whether the women ought not also to be protected by law, and in their opposition to any alteration of the existing legislation the manufacturers were aided by many others who said that women were well able to take care of themselves. But that was a great mistake. He himself had opposed that measure, but he had since had ample opportunity of becoming convinced of his error. He had already confessed his mistake, and, after speaking upon the subject in the House, Sir James Graham said to him, "I am glad you have made your recantation. I shall do so too." Well, then, the mines came next, and a blue-book was published on that subject, which furnished one of the most marked instances of the doings of this generation, and a more horrible exhibition was never made before an alarmed, amazed, and an astounded public. Legislation in regard to mines was, however, opposed by the mining proprietors. Now, he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether any one of those various Acts had produced the least possible injury to trade, notwithstanding that at the time when they were passed they were told that if Parliament limited the time of the factories the manufacturers would be ruined. But the fact was that our manufactories, to use the pompous language of Johnson, "have risen like exhalations" throughout the country. His right hon. Friend ought not to attach much value to memorials signed by workmen and their children, because his right hon. Friend could not help knowing that the workmen were entirely under the control of their masters, and that the children in the same way might be induced to adopt any course which their parents might deem advisable. The right hon. Gentleman's own experience must have shown him that no children were so harshly treated as those who had cruel parents. A child was oftentimes converted into a mere machine for the profit of its idle and dissolute father. Why did his right hon. Friend propose to omit the clause bearing upon the employment of packers? He acknowledged that in Manchester the evil existed, and if he believed that it did not exist at Bradford, where could be the harm in applying the Act? He (Mr. Roebuck) received a letter from Mr. Walker, of Bradford, in consequence of the Government having announced their intention to propose the omission of the shipping warehouses from the Bill, in which the writer stated that these warehouses employed a great number of boys even until midnight, and that they were deliberately included in the Bill when introduced in accordance with the Commissioners' Report. The writer added that no new light had been thrown upon the treatment of those boys in these warehouses, and that it was only a few interested German merchants, who, having a great number of these warehouses in Manchester, Bradford, &c., had induced Mr. Baines and Mr. W. E. Forster to endeavour to induce the Government to omit these warehouses, and the writer concluded by assuring him (Mr. Roebuck) that the public at large would rejoice to find the Bill passed entire as it was laid on the table of the House. After these things had been proved to exist, and after the statement of the hon. Member for Paisley that the evil existed in Manchester, he could not understand the Government, upon an interested memorial of certain persons, turning round and saying, "We are told that the evil does not exist at Bradford, and therefore we will withdraw the only thing in the Bill which really would do good, because we are told there is a possible mischief." They had abundant evidence to warrant their progressing with the Bill in its entirety. He asked the Government whether they would yield to the interested clamour of the manufacturers, who had opposed every reform which had been introduced into the regulation of the factories. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the trades referred to in the clause which he proposed to strike out would be made the subject of inquiry, and that the result of that inquiry would be acted upon next year. The right hon. Gentleman, however, must know that the fewer the people who had a right to complain the less would it be in their power to procure a remedy. A lukewarmness would come over those who were protected by the law, and the same zeal would not be exhibited in freeing the remainder from the tyranny and cruelty to which they were subjected. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether his opposition in former times to the interested clamour of the manufacturers had not been, on the whole, exceedingly beneficial.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he should be sorry to revive long forgotten controversies, but he might safely affirm what was a very gratifying fact, that experience had shown the Factory Acts to have been successful in every respect. There was another principle, however, concerned in the present measure, that of legislating without sufficient inquiry. He could not but regard the course which his right hon. Friend proposed to take as correct, because the proposal was simply one of postponement for the purposes of inquiry, and not one of exclusion.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, that the Bradford people, for the purpose of sparing themselves a little inconvenience, were willing to withhold benefits conferred by the Act from a large number of women and children. He regretted very much the course which the right hon. Gentleman had indicated his intention to pursue. He maintained that there was not only evidence sufficient to show that the clause was needed, but that its necessity was felt by all but those against whose interests it would operate. Petitions had been presented from all the great towns praying for restrictive legislation, and those petitions had in all cases been carried at public meetings and by overwhelming majorities. There were 2,500 boys employed in the warehouses of Manchester alone, and he asked the Committee whether that large number of children was to be left to the tender mercies of their employers. He should support the retention of the words proposed to be omitted.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY said, he believed that his right hon. Friend had not withdrawn the clause on account of any pressure from the manufacturers, but because information had been received from Manchester alone; and it was considered necessary that the state of things in the other great towns should be inquired into. The truth was, that the warehousemen were afraid of the Act in the same way that the manufacturers feared the introduction of the Factory Acts, but he felt certain that their opinion would by-and-bye undergo the same change as that experienced by the manufacturers. He hoped that his right hon. Friend would not hesitate to pass the whole measure through Parliament as the Committee appeared determined to insist upon the retention of the clause.

SIR JOHN OGILVY said, he thought that the postponement proposed by the right hon. Gentleman for the purposes of further inquiry was but reasonable, as so many gentlemen had complained that their business would suffer from unnecessary interference, and that if time were given them they would be able to prove their case.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he should support the Bill in its original form. He believed that legislation like that before them had done more to draw classes together, and to produce that admirable state of feeling which had been exhibited during the recent Lancashire distress, than anything else in the world. He felt certain that if the Ten Hours Act had not accompanied the introduction of free trade, the latter measure would have been a failure. The Manchester houses were willing to accept the un mutilated Bill, and it was only a few houses in Bradford that selfishly resisted. The pressure which required these unnatural hours of labour only existed for a few months in the year, and might easily be met, either by employing more hands, or by refusing orders above what could be easily executed. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would not recede from the position which they had originally taken up. Allusion had been made in the course of these discussions to a meeting which had been held in Bradford. His information respecting that meeting was, that resolutions were carried by large majorities in favour of the original Bill, and that when the question of delay was started it met with strong opposition.

MR. BAXTER suggested that an extension of the Bleach Works Act would meet the case of the packers. He was disappointed to hear from the Under Secretary of State that no further legislation was contemplated, but merely inquiry. In his opinion, the inquiry into the state of the trades under discussion would only be a waste of time, for the result must be the same, as legislation could not be avoided. He was himself a calenderer and finisher in Dundee, and for many years had prohibited employment in his factory after six in the evening. His managers had informed him that more and better work was got out of the people in ten hours, than had previously been obtained by prolonged hours of labour. He hoped that if evidence was to be taken upon the subject the Committee would examine working men as well as proprietors.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, after the statements made that afternoon, and ask him whether he could have the courage to face the feeling upon the subject out of doors as well as in the House?

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he did not rise to represent any interest objecting to the curtailment of labour. He thought, however, that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was a very fair one to the parties whose interests would be affected by the Bill. A little delay and further inquiry would result in more satisfactory legislation than could be obtained in the present state of their information.

MR. POTTER admitted that he had been opposed to the Factory Acts before their introduction, but that he had become a convert on seeing their beneficial working. He placed most perfect reliance on the conduct and character of the factory Inspectors, and should support the retention of the clauses.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he thought that nothing was less applicable to the question before the Committee than the remarks of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr Roebuck), because the question embraced no contest between humanity and selfishness. The only contest was between the earnest purpose of the Minister to extend the benefits of legislation to overworked women and children, and his enlightened caution which urged him not to overstep the proper boundary. The Committee should remember that, but for the right hon. Gentleman, they would have had no Bill at all.

MR. CRUM-EWING observed, that he had not the slightest objection to the hours and regulations of the Bleaching Act being applied in this case.

MR. RAINES said, a petition had been presented from the Leeds Chamber of Commerce bearing out the idea of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns), who said he had put no pressure upon the Government. He had merely presented a petition from the Leeds Chamber of Commerce in favour of further inquiry. He had communicated with the hon. Member for Bradford, and had received information from him to the effect that he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had received a numerous deputation from the packers themselves, who were perfectly satisfied with the present hours of labours, which were much less oppressive than the factory hours. His belief was that the safe course to take would be for the right hon. Gentleman to act upon the pledge which he had given, especially as the parties to whom that pledge was given were absent from the House. He quite agreed that inasmuch as no inquiry had taken place into the case of the "shipping warehouses," it would not be wise to legislate in regard to them upon mere experts statements made in that House.

MR. WICKHAM said, the men employed in the warehouses at Bradford had assured him that the hours of labour were not excessive, for that they did not commence work till eight or nine, and sometimes as late as ten o'clock.

MR. J. A. TURNER said, that the manufacturers of the country did not at all deserve the strictures of the hon. Member for Sheffield, as they were desirous of contributing in every possible way to the comfort and interests of their workpeople. He would express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman would adhere to his resolution to omit the shipping warehouses from the Bill. He entertained a strong opinion that the greatest injury would be inflicted on the young persons and women employed in the warehouses at Manchester if they were included in the provisions of the Bill.

MR. ROEBUCK repeated his statement that no legislation had been introduced without opposition from the manufacturers.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he entirely disagreed with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, that the opposition to improve the condition of the children of the working classes arose, in this instance, from the masters and employers. His experience, on the contrary, had proved to him that the masters themselves were most anxious of having legislation of this kind, because they had no other means of securing the health of their work-people. He believed, from what he had heard during the discussion, that the majority of the Committee was in favour of the retention of the clause, and he could not see that any object would be obtained by going to a division. He believed, however, that a good many hon. Members who would vote against him if he went to a division would not be unfavourable to a modification of the clause. He should, therefore, propose an adjournment of the Committee for ten days, in order that the Government might be able to decide upon some arrangement which would probably accord with the views of hon. Members generally.

MR. COLLINS said, he thoroughly believed in the advantages which had accrued from factory legislation, and he regarded the measure before the Committee as a step in the right direction.

MR. H. A. BRUCE moved that the Committee report Progress, stating that he should bring up the Bill again on Monday week.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday, 27th June.

INDIA—THE RAJAH OF DHAR.

QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has issued, or is about to issue, any fresh Instructions to the Government of India relative to the restoration to the Rajah of Dhar of the Government of that State; and, if so, whether he will lay them upon the Table?

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply, said the Government had not issued any recent instructions, because they were in expectation of receiving by every mail a Report relating to the administration of Dhar during the last year. An order had, as the noble Lord was no doubt aware, been issued in 1860 to restore the administration of the district to the Rajah on his becoming of age, but he was found to be so weakly in body and mind as to be incapable of discharging the necessary functions. During the course of the year ending April, 1863, which was the period up to which the last Report gave any account, the resident Minister took the greatest pains in training the Rajah to enable him to perform the duties of his station. They paid visits throughout the country together, and nearly the whole business of the place was intrusted to the Minister of the Rajah, in communication with whom the Rajah himself was placed. He was not, he might add, without hope the Report which was daily expected might state that the entire authority had already been placed in the hands of the Rajah.

INDIA—THE NATIVE PRESS.

QUESTION.

MR. ADAM said, he would also beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether, considering the great importance of our obtaining a better insight into the feelings of the Natives of India, and better information as to their opinions, he will not recommend each of the Governments in India to appoint an officer whose duty it shall be to translate and report to Government all matters of public interest discussed in the Native Press; and whether such an officer has not been already appointed in Bengal, whose labours have proved most useful?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, in reply, that an officer had been employed in Bengal for the purposes described in the hon. Gentleman's Question. That officer was employed to collect and translate what seemed to be of interest in the Native papers of India, and he had no hesitation in saying that considerable advantage had been derived from the means thus acquired of becoming acquainted with the feelings and opinions of the Native population. He was not quite sure that this was sufficient to warrant him in giving orders that it should be done elsewhere, but he had no doubt the other Governments of India had their eyes upon the subject, and they would find—as he had no doubt they would—that it would be advantageous to pursue the same principle in Madras and Bombay.

INDIA—BRITISH BURMAH.

QUESTION.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, If he will take into his favourable consideration the wish of many respectable British Merchants and Traders in British Burmah, to have a High Court of Judicature established at Moulmein?

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied, that he was not prepared to incur any considerable expense for the establishment of a Court of that magnitude. The Government had endeavoured to improve the administration of justice there by appointing a barrister; but, upon the whole, they found that the people were not so well satisfied with his administration of justice as they were with the administration of the lieutenant of the Bengal Artillery who did it before.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE ASHANTEE WAR.

RESOLUTION.

SIR JOHN HAY*: Sir, the subject which I am about to introduce to the notice of the House is one which I believe to be of considerable importance to the national honour, and I trust the House will favour me with their kind indulgence should I be obliged to trespass on their attention for some considerable time. I fear that I may have to do so, for I shall hardly be able to state the subject clearly without going into many details. It is now nearly two months ago since I took occasion to address a question to the Colonial Secretary upon the subject of the war with Ashantee, and I do not believe that at the time I did so there were ten Members in the House out of the Cabinet who were aware that war had been commenced with that country. The reason why I have taken upon myself the duty of calling attention to this painful subject is, that I have myself served upon that station, and am personally cognizant of the country to which I am about to refer; and, unfortunately, a near relative of mine has served on this expedition, and in it has lost his life, with many another brave soldier whose loss we must all deplore. And here I may be pardoned for saying that my unfortunate relative was able, discreet, and resolute, as the reports of his superiors testify, and that in him Her Majesty has lost a good and faithful servant.

And now let me say something as to the country which has been the scene of this war. Cape Coast Castle, as is well known, is a settlement about 1,000 miles from Sierra Leone, the only civilized town, if even it deserves that title, in that part of the world. It is an old castle, built originally by the Portuguese, upon a granite rock which projects into the sea. To the eastward of it is a small river, which during the rains is often a flood, but during the greater part of the year is a swamp, and the water of which is not fit for the use either of human beings or of animals. Along the sandy shore between the river and the sea extends the town of Cape Coast Castle, principally inhabited by a Native population, under the protection of the fort, generally numbering about 10,000 persons. The water for supplying the town is collected in tanks during the rainy season; and the water so collected is supposed to be sufficient to supply the wants of the normal population during the dry portion of the year. The fort of Cape Coast formerly had very large and ample tanks; but many of them are now out of repair, and those that are in good condition are only sufficient to supply with water a force of about 250 men, which is the usual garrison. It is true that since these operations commenced, some six or seven months after the troops were sent there, in the month of January, Her Majesty's Government sent a distilling apparatus to Cape Coast Castle, to supply the troops, but unfortunately that apparatus was not in order until early in May, so that there was no sufficient supply of water for the additional influx of troops until the rainy season had again set in, and the necessity for the distilling apparatus was not so apparent as it had previously been. There are at Cape Coast Castle no animals suitable for the food of man, no sheep or cattle. There is no herbage to feed them, and as soon as cattle are brought to the settlement they are killed. As much of the meat as is required is consumed fresh and the rest is salted for future use. The food supplied to the troops is therefore mainly salt provisions and navy biscuit.

The Colonial officer in charge at Cape Coast Castle is Mr. Richard Pine, and I am sorry to see, from a source which may perhaps be supposed to indicate the opinions of Her Majesty's Government, that there seems to be some intention to throw the blame of these proceedings on Governor Pine. He was formerly Attorney General at the Gambia. He is an able and clever lawyer, and was appointed—in consequence of his knowledge of the affairs of that part of Africa—to be Governor of Cape Coast Castle. He has been very much abused, but the House will forgive me if I endeavour to show that the censure which has been cast upon him is not altogether deserved. The papers of my poor brother who (shortly after his arrival with the troops at Cape Coast Castle) received orders to act in a political capacity under Governor Pine, have come into my hands, and among them are some despatches which throw light upon the policy which the Governor proposed to adopt. In an official letter dated the 15th of December, 1863, and addressed to "Lieutenant Hay, 4th West India Regiment, Commanding Volunteer Corps," Governor Pine says—

"Sir,—Upon your Report, at the request of Afarka and Bosoomfra, and mainly at your suggestion, I have embodied a corps of Volunteers, who have become virtually soldiers, and which you have volunteered to command, under the sanction of Colonel Conran. The objects I have in view in this undertaking are so well known to you that I shall encumber you with few instructions. The chiefs to whose support you proceed, against a threatened attack of King Amantifou, I consider deserve the countenance, and, if necessary, the armed assistance, of this Government; at the same time, I cannot impress upon your mind my extreme anxiety, and the almost necessity which exists for hostilities not being adopted on our part if they can be avoided. Your duty will be rather to conciliate the dissenting party, and I doubt not that your appearance with your little force will have the effect of preventing bloodshed, so soon as it is known that Afarka and Bosoomfra are under British protection; but you will be justified in using your force in resisting an attack upon the chiefs, if the sole cause of quarrel be their resistance of the passage of munitions of war and stores to the Ashantee country. It is possible that the French authorities, as you are aware, will indirectly attempt to uphold the tribes unfriendly to us, but I most urgently call upon you to avoid collision with the French authorities, or a breach of international law. In case of danger of such collision being imminent, you will, if possible, make amicable arrangements, or refer the question to this Government; but I do not fear direct interference so much as clandestine influence, against which you will be prepared. You will be good enough to present the accompanying letter to the Governor of Elmina, and obtain his permission before marching through his territory; and such march, I trust, will be effected throughout in the least ostentatious manner, defiance not being the object of your mission, but an effort to preserve peace. In full reliance on your discretion,

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your most obedient servant,

"RICH. PINE, Governor."

This letter seems to me to show that, so far from having any bloodthirsty intention, Governor Pine's wish was to be as humane as possible, and the only strong suggestions of war were embodied in a despatch from the Colonial Office, which threw blame upon Major Cochrane, the former commandant, and offered stimulants and suggestions of aggressive measures to his successor. I have thought it but fair to an officer who is absent from this country, and in a most difficult and responsible position, to give him the benefit of the defence which this letter affords him, and which contrasts favourably with those which Her Majesty's Government has selected to produce to the House.

Extending from Cape Coast Castle almost 100 miles into the interior is the Fantee territory, inhabited by Native tribes which claim our protection. Beyond this is the kingdom of Ashantee, and less than 200 miles from Cape Coast Castle is the town of Kumasi, which is the capital of that kingdom. With the King of Ashantee we have, as the papers partially show, certain political arrangements. If a slave escapes from Ashantee and touches the British or protected territory he becomes free. It is not the custom of the authorities of Cape Coast Castle to give up such slaves, nor does the King of Ashantee usually demand them. We have also an agreement in the nature of a treaty of extradition with Ashantee, according to which criminals are to be given up by Ashantee to us, when proved guilty, and vice versé. In 1862, a subject of the King of Ashantee, a slave who was working in the gold mines, escaped and crossed over into the Fantee territory, taking with him a portion of the gold. This being the property of the monarch, the King of Ashantee, after some preliminary correspondence with the Governor of the Gold Coast, claimed the slave as a thief; but the Governor, rightly or wrongly, thought he was not justified in giving him up, believing that the major of his being an escaped slave included the minor of his being a thief. The King of Ashantee replied that if the slave were innocent he should not have claimed him, but, being a thief, he could not admit that the fact of his being a slave ought to save him from punishment. He accordingly sent some men across the frontier to endeavour to seize him in one of the Fantee villages in which he believed him to be concealed. They failed to accomplish their purpose, but burned the village, and committed some acts of destruction, which, I have been assured, could not be supposed to exceed £400 in value. The matter was represented to the Colonial Office, which decided upon war, and took measures accordingly.

The Returns in the hands of Members are very imperfect, but it appears from them that on the 1st of July last, in time of peace, 686 men and 18 officers, about the strength intended to be maintained permanently on the coast, were already on the spot. Three officers, Major Heyrick, Captain Barnard, and my brother, then serving at the Cape of Good Hope, were ordered home in the spring of last year, with a view of proceeding to the West Indies, there to join a newly raised regiment for service on the west coast of Africa. They were exceedingly astonished when they received those orders, but in obedience to them returned to this country, and my brother was with me in this country last June. I mention this fact because a statement has been put forth, that at that time no intention of war was entertained, whereas when my brother was with me in England he had orders to go to the coast of Africa by the West Indies, and I gave him letters of introduction to Commodore Wilmot and others on the coast of Africa, which I would not have done unless I had known he was going there. Of those three officers two are now dead, and one is in such a condition that it is feared he may never recover. Fortunately, however, he has reached this country, and I trust Captain Barnard may again serve the Queen. I am not now about to question the policy which Her Majesty's Government has thought proper to adopt in commencing this war, but, as they decided to carry on war upon the Gold Coast, I am entitled to inquire how they have conducted it. I have seen something of military and naval operations in most parts of the world, and have been personally engaged in most of the wars in which we have been involved for the last thirty years. I may be supposed, therefore, to have some experience of this matter. One would imagine that every comfort for troops serving in such a deadly climate would have been immediately sent out; and as there is no good water there, and no supplies can be obtained on the spot, one would imagine that roomy and ample transports conveying the expedition would have been moored in the anchorage off Cape Coast Castle to afford a base of operations; that steam transports would have been forthcoming to convey fresh provisions from Sierra Leone, or any other place from which it was thought desirable to draw supplies; and, further, that hospital ships to receive the sick, and steamers to take them away to a position where they might recover from disease or from gunshot wounds, would have been provided. It would also have been desirable that the steam transports should have been employed, as in the Crimea, in distilling water for the use of the troops. With such appliances, the war, though still dangerous and deadly, would not have been as fatal as it has proved; and Her Majesty's Government, having made up their minds to send 1,800 men upon such duty, were bound to supply them with materials other than a distilling apparatus that would not work, brackish water remaining for the use of 200 men, and salt provisions, and single canvas tents for shelter, whilst the thermometer stood at ninety-four in the shade. I do not wish to state the case more strongly than it deserves; I do not wish to make an unjust attack upon any Department. But, as the war is estimated to have cost £14,000 a month, I must say that all which could be necessary for the safety of the troops or the efficient conduct of hostilities ought to have been supplied; and that Her Majesty's Government, which had thought proper to incur this expense without the sanction, and, indeed, without the knowledge of this House, would have done well either to have consulted the House, or else not to have starved the war and killed our men. War to be successful ought to be conducted so as to bring matters to an issue as speedily as possible, but in the present case it seems that this maxim, and, indeed, the dictates of common sense, has been lost sight of. The officer whom I have mentioned sailed in Her Majesty's ship Megara from Plymouth in June for Jamaica, and orders had been previously forwarded for the troops there to be ready to embark for the Gold Coast. The troops were ready on her arrival, and embarked at once, and sailed for Africa. As there are some unaccountable errors in the official Return, I prefer to take the numbers from particulars furnished to me from other sources; and, according to these, one wing of the Fourth West India Regiment, under Colonel Conran, numbering 21 officers and 450 men, embarked in the course of the month of July and sailed immediately for Cape Coast Castle, reaching it on the 14th of August. There is a rumour that Colonel Conran is to be blamed for having committed a mistake; that he, being an officer who had served in hot climates, ought to have attended to the commissariat, and that to his neglect, or that of Governor Pine, is owing what has occurred. Now, Colonel Conran, on arriving at the Gold Coast, was, I am assured, very much astonished at the position in which he found himself. A considerable body of troops, quite sufficient for the existing supplies, were already on the spot, and he was thrown on shore with 450 men and 21 officers additional. Naturally he referred to Governor Pine for instructions as to the duty which he was expected to perform, those which he had himself received being by no means clear, the only thing to be gathered from them being that he was to place himself at the disposal of Governor Pine. The Governor told him his orders were to march to Prahsu, a town on the river Prah, and to occupy Mansu and Shahsu. By the desire of the Government, he had already deposited supplies of salt provisions at certain places on the line of march, and huts for the accommodation of the soldiers would speedily be erected. Colonel Conran, I understand, acted in a manner that was highly creditable to him. I am told he is an officer who has risen from the ranks; but he must be an able soldier or Her Majesty's Government would never have selected him for this special service. He is a hardy, rough British officer, and a proof of this may be found in the fact that officers who have just returned to this country report of Colonel Conran a characteristic declaration that "he was fulfilling and would fulfil the instructions of Her Majesty's Government, though only two white officers were left to follow him." Colonel Conran told the Governor he was ready to obey the orders, though he certainly thought they were not wise; and he was then shown a despatch from the Colonial Office, blaming Major Cochrane, his predecessor, and charging him with inactivity, and a want of military virtues more important even than activity. Like a good soldier, Colonel Conran obeyed orders, and a commissary, Mr. Blanc, having been sent out to endeavour to provide for the troops, he likewise proceeded to do his best to fulfil his duty. He had command of money, but of no other facilities whatever, for it seemed to be forgotten that the scene of action was 1,000 miles from Sierra Leone. Mr. Blanc, however, was highly praised by Governor Pine for what he had done with the slender means at his disposal; and, therefore, it is plain that no blame attaches either to Governor Pine, to Colonel Conran, or to Mr. Blanc the commissary, for the misfortunes which afterwards befel the force. When the Megara landed the expeditionary force, instead of remaining attached to it, she sailed on other duties and disappeared from the scene. Colonel Conran marched his force, as directed, to Mansu, to Prahsu, to Shahsu, and other places; and shortly afterwards a large force of volunteers was raised far away to the west, at Dixcove. To that force no medical man was attached, and Colonel

Conran, writing to the officer in command on the 29th of January, said—

"Sir,—Under existing circumstances you will, on receipt of this letter, march from where you now are to Akropong, in Denkera, with your detachment of volunteers, and there remain in the defence of the King and his people, as allies of Her Majesty's Government against the Ashantees. The King, who is here and knows me, will house your men. I will in a few days forward a medical officer to your assistance from the Prah, by a road leading thence. The King's son, Quacoe Mame, is my A.D.C., and upon whom you may depend for truthful information. Your letter the Governor and myself received this morning from Gorgie.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your most obedient servant,

"E. CONRAN,

"Lieutenant Colonel commanding Troops."

That communication was addressed to Lieutenant Hay, commanding the volunteers on the Gold Coast, and is marked "Pressing." The medical officer never reached the force, and the volunteers consequently entered upon the war without any medical aid whatever. This letter shows that the volunteers raised were acting as a combined force for the invasion of Ashantee. Among the papers in my possession is a copy of an official letter, written by my brother to the Governor, after he was almost too ill for exertion of any kind, in the following terms:—

"Sir,—I have the honour to report, for the information of the officer commanding, the 4th West India Regiment on the 11th of this month with everything correct. The march throughout was good, considering the nature of the country. One day we crossed forty-nine rivers, some by fording and others by large trees, so that long marches cannot be made in a day of even ten hours' march. I had to make two halts on the road, one of one day to rest the men, and another of three days to take medicine for the country fever, of which the men had an attack, but are now nearly all right, except from the weakness incidental to a sharp attack of that sickness."

So that the officers and men on detached expeditions were without any medical advice, the blame of which, however, does not rest with the officers who despatched them. Those officers volunteered for that service, and there were no medical men to send. Her Majesty's Government sent out twelve medical officers. Three are dead, three are invalided, and the remaining six have been described to me as walking skeletons who have been left to do duty at Cape Coast Castle. About that time the commanding officer of one of Her Majesty's ships then at Cape Coast was asked to give two Excellent seamen to man the rocket battery attached to the expedition. Two men were sent up, and both died. Commodore Wilmot, the able naval Commander-in-Chief on the West Coast, whose experience is great, and whose talents are recognized, and who had officially protested against this war, for he well knew the coast, was so angry that he threatened to bring a charge against the captain in command of the detachment for not properly lodging and feeding his men. Doctor Rutherford, the medical officer with the detachment, agreed in this charge, and was about to give evidence in support of it, but he died also, and it was found on inquiry that the seamen were as well lodged and fed as the officers of the army. That official correspondence has not yet appeared, but I suppose it is in the possession of Her Majesty's Government.

Throughout last winter there was great sickness at Cape Coast Castle. I have examined the Return laid on the table, and have endeavoured to ascertain how many have died. The Return now in the hands of Members gives a total of 64 officers and 1,745 men who have been landed since 1st July, 1863, or were present at that date, and it gives 1,348 men and 48 officers as now remaining fit for duty. There must, however, be some mistake here, because the Return gives 35 out of the 64 officers as dead or invalided, in addition to those in hospital in Cape Coast Castle. Out of 1,745 men 1,348 are said to be efficient. That leaves 397 hors de combat, whereas the Return of the number of men dead and invalided is 127, which leaves 270 men not accounted for. They are "missing," in military parlance, which means dead or deserted. As it is not likely they have deserted to the King of Ashantee, I come to the other painful conclusion.

On the 9th of April this year H.M.S. Tamar landed reinforcements from the West Indies at Cape Coast Castle. She brought 643 men and 27 officers. At that time there were troops at various camps in the interior, but there were many men sick at Cape Coast, and 15 officers also ill in the Castle. The Tamar landed her men on the beach of Cape Coast Castle. She brought no provision for the mass of wretchedness there. The troops already there were in Native huts, and those brought by the Tamar were marched to the front and put under canvas. Before the Tamar left, 120 of the men she brought were down with sickness. The medical officer said he would have given his own life to have had those poor men put on board the Tamar. Captain Stirling, an excellent officer, took compassion on a poor lady, and against orders took her to Gibraltar and saved her life. The Tamar had no orders to have anything to do with the expedition. With the usual red-tape routine, she was ordered, after landing her troops, immediately to proceed on another service, and to remove a regiment from Gibraltar; and these poor sick men from the ramparts saw her steaming away for the western horizon, and with her the last gleam of hope shrunk within their breasts. They nearly all died. One would have imagined that the Government when sending a steamship to this part of the world, where there was no one to give orders—for the Governor was gone to sea, ill, Colonel Conran was up the country, and the commanding officer at Cape Coast Castle was delirious with fever—would have given orders to the captain of the Tamar to bring away with him any men who might have been wounded or suffering from fever. But the captain had positive orders to proceed on another service. The captain was probably not aware of what was going on on shore, and he steamed away in obedience to his orders, leaving these men to die. "The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel." It would be rather too painful to read the names of the officers whose services have been in this manner lost to their country. Some few may have recovered, but I have been told by a medical man that the effect of the fever is so debilitating upon the constitution, that those who died were almost happier than those who lived. When the last mail left there—for the African mail called there every month—there were nine officers and eighty-five men left in the apology for an hospital in Cape Coast Castle, who were living on brackish water and salt beef. The mail steamer was so full that there was no room for any one. Her medical officer was kindness itself to those who embarked on board her; but there was no preparation for invalids: the surgeon himself gave up his cabin to a poor lady who died; and the sick officers, packed in small cabins, were without those comforts so necessary to their recovery. Some died at sea; others were landed at Sierra Leone, and died there.

Now, Sir, I understand the Government propose to send out the Gladiator to bring away the troops. I wish to tell the House, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies will bear me out, that I have not wished to keep secret the information I have received. I have not endeavoured to throw it on the House as a surprise for party purposes. I drew up a memorandum, which I showed to many of my friends, and afterwards placed in the hands of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and I understand the right hon. Gentleman has shown it to the noble Marquess the Under Secretary for War. In the same spirit yesterday morning I called upon my noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty to state that I understood no transport had been taken up or sent, and that I was about to put a question in the House in the form which I placed in the noble Lord's hands. In consequence of the noble Lord's answer, I noted down another question, and called on the noble Marquess at the War Office. I told the noble Marquess that I should put that question to him in the House. In consequence of my notice, the Admiralty decided on sending the Gladiator. At this time, therefore, although some sailing transport, whose name is not known, is under repair, the only actual and tangible ship is the Gladiator. She is to bring away 600 men, which, according to the Government Return, leaves 270 men unaccounted for. The House has been told that it is the intention of the Government to keep 700 or 800 men there, and to bring away 500. Now, the Gladiator is to carry these men to Cape Verd. Hon. Gentlemen looking at a map are apt to forget the great distance that separates Cape Coast from Cape Verd. The Cape Verd Islands are nearly 2,000 miles from Cape Coast Castle. It will be necessary to carry these black men, who are debilitated by climate and sickness, upon deck, for the Gladiator has little room beyond what is necessary for her own crew. Is it possible that it is proposed to carry 550 sickly men on deck from Cape Coast Castle to Cape Verd—a distance of nearly 2,000 miles? When they get to Cape Verd, which is a sickly place, have Her Majesty's Government obtained permission from the Portuguese Government for these men to disembark? The quarantine law in those Islands is said to be very strict, as I believe is well known. Will the Portuguese Government allow these black troops to break their laws, and, after twelve or fourteen days' voyage, will they allow them to land (if any are then alive) on their shores and await the arrival of a vessel that is not yet ready for sailing? But what sort of a ship is the Gladiator? In the Report on the Health of the Navy in 1859 the Gladiator is stated to have been built at Woolwich in 1844. Her length of gun-deck is 190 feet; keel for tonnage, 164 feet; extreme breadth, 37½ feet; depth of hold, 23 feet. She is 1,200 tons burden, her draught of water is 7 feet 7 inches forward, and 9 feet 4 inches aft. The Gladiator was, I believe, ordered home not long ago, partly from defects and partly from being unhealthy. Her crew were not paid off, but turned over to the Greyhound. From the Report of the Health of the Navy, 1859, page 44, it appears that the Gladiator had 23 cases of yellow fever at Havannah in October, of which two died. The disease was checked by the ship running out of the tropics to Halifax. Comparing the ratio of non-effectives daily per 1,000 of mean force in the Indus, the ship which I then had the honour to command, and the Gladiator, the following is the result:—Indus, 40·5; Gladiator, 78·8. Sent to Hospital—Indus, one year, 38; Gladiator, three months, 25; Indus's complement, 600; Gladiator's complement, 255. By the Report of the Health of the Navy, 1860, page 97, the Gladiator again shows an unhealthy ratio of sickness:—Number of complement, 160 only (previous Return 255); average number daily of non-effectives, 14·3; ratio per 1,000 of mean force, 79·4; being the fourth ship bearing the greatest proportion of sick, those with a larger number having all been fever ships in 1860. That ship, which will not contain 500 men below, and which is reported as being unhealthy, is the vessel which has suddenly sailed after notice of a question has been given, and is the only chance of life that our officers and men at Cape Coast Castle have. They are to be conveyed by that ship to a Portuguese colony, which may not receive them, there to be put into a ship whose name even is unknown, and which has not yet sailed. The question which I now have to ask the House is, who is to blame? There has been a sort of hushed suggestion that a noble Duke, whose illness I personally regret and which is regretted by all who know him, is to be the scape-goat of the Ministry. I have shown, however, that the Colonial Office is not the Department which is specially to blame. It has been also suggested that the Governor is to blame, but I have pointed out that the Governor has only followed the instructions which have been given him. The Colonial Governor could not order officers from the Cape of Good Hope, nor troops from Jamaica, nor transports nor other ships from England. I have no doubt, if the Governor had the power, the waters of Cape Coast would have been covered with transports. Therefore, the Colonial Governor is not to blame. Well, the Colonial Minister has not the power to declare war—that is a Cabinet question; and, therefore, before 2,000 men can be sent, a great expense incurred, and a disastrous expedition determined upon, there must be some consultation among Her Majesty's Ministers. It appears to me that the Cabinet are responsible for this war; that the War Office is responsible for the ordering of the troops, and for the insufficient commissariat. The Admiralty, in a slight degree, is also to blame for the want of sufficient transports. The Admiralty and Transport Office in those cases act only on requisition from the War Office, but, if no requisition was made, the responsibility for not sending transports, store-ships, and supplies rests especially with the War Department. But that Department cannot act without the Treasury where a large sum of money is required, and, therefore, those two Departments seem to me particularly responsible. I therefore ask this question, "Who is to blame?" and I trust Her Majesty's Government will find an answer. Who is to blame? The men who have betrayed Denmark and truckled to Germany. Who is to blame? The men who have alienated France and irritated Russia. Who is to blame? The men who have convulsed China and devastated Japan; the same men who ten years ago sent a British army to perish of cold, of hunger, and of want of shelter in a Crimean winter, and have now sent British troops to perish of fever, of thirst, and of want of shelter on the burning plains and fetid swamps of Western Africa. These men cling to that front Bench with wonderful tenacity, and they send other men to die with wonderful courage. I appeal to this House to do justice to its soldiers; I pray of them to purge themselves from complicity in this crime. I entreat you to lay the blood of our brethren—which cries to us from the ground—where it is deserved—at the door of Her Majesty's Ministers. I move, Sir, that Her Majesty's Government, in landing forces on the Gold Coast for the purpose of waging war against the King of Ashantee without making any sufficient provision for preserving the health of the troops to be employed there, have incurred a grave responsibility, and that this House laments the want of foresight which has caused so large a loss of life.

Sir John Hay

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "Her Majesty's Government, in landing Forces on the Gold Coast for the purpose of waging war against the King of Ashantee, without making any sufficient provision for preserving the health of the Troops to be employed there, have incurred a grave responsibility; and that this House laments the want of foresight which has caused so large a loss of life,"—(Sir John Hay.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was quite sure they all sympathized very deeply with the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just addressed the House, for the very painful loss which he had sustained—the loss of a distinguished and gallant brother upon the inhospitable shores of Africa. He trusted, however, that, much as the House might sympathize with the hon. and gallant Member, no feeling of that kind would induce them to assent to the Resolution which had just been moved without more careful inquiry into the facts and better evidence for his assertions than the hon. and gallant Gentleman had afforded. He did not propose to follow the hon. and gallant Member through the whole of his speech, or to answer all the allegations which had been made against Her Majesty's Government; but as the weight of the indictment and the greatest number of charges had been brought against the Department which he had the honour to represent in that House, he hoped the House would bear with him while he explained as well and as shortly as he could the arrangements which had been made by that Department, the loss which the country had actually sustained, and the real facts of the case with respect to the operations under notice. The hon. and gallant Member had stated that a considerable number of troops had from time to time been landed on the Gold Coast by order of the Government, with the object of prosecuting hostilities against the King of Ashantee. He must distinctly state that the only troops which had been sent by order of Her Majesty's Government, and had been landed upon the Gold Coast with that object, were the seven companies which landed at Cape Coast Castle from the Tamar in the April of this year. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had stated that the troops which arrived under the command of Colonel Conran in the August of last year must have been intended for that purpose. Without fatiguing the House by entering into all the negotiations which had taken place between the War Office and the Colonial Office with respect to the number of troops, he might state that as long ago as 1862 the Colonial Office urged on the Horse Guards that the increased requirements of the service needed an increase of the troops to be permanently maintained on the West Coast of Africa. On account of the difficulty of preparing a considerable number of troops for that purpose, the proposition was at that time resisted by the War Office, and no increase of force was sanctioned; but late in 1862 the Gold Coast Artillery Corps—which up to that time was the only corps permanently stationed there—mutinied and had to be disbanded. In consequence of that mutiny, and also of the continual requisitions of the Colonial Office, it was determined to raise another West India regiment, and until that regiment had been raised, it was decided that the head-quarters and one wing of the 4th West India Regiment, he believed, under the command of Colonel Conran, should proceed to the Gold Coast for the purpose of taking the place of the corps which had mutinied. That proposed arrangement he asserted positively, and he hoped the House would give him its attention, had been commenced before the Government had any notice of a war, and it would have been made equally as well when Major Cochrane was in command, whether the war had taken place or not; nor were the troops under command of Colonel Conran sent with the object of taking part in hostilities against the King of Ashantee. The point was of some importance, because the number of the troops to which the hon. and gallant Member's Motion referred would very much vary with the fact whether the troops landed from the Megara were or were not intended to wage war with the King of the Ashantees.

One of the principal grounds of accusation against Her Majesty's Government appeared to be that sufficient preparation was not made for the troops which were landed from the Tamar at Cape Coast Castle in April of the present year; and, though the hon. Member had not mentioned it, the statement had been made that sufficient foresight had not been exercised in regulating the time in which those troops should be disembarked from the Tamar on that coast. Now he had a statement of the dates of the different orders and proceedings connected with the conveyance of the troops by the Tamar, which would show that no unnecessary delay took place in the despatch of the reinforcements to Colonel Conran. He would leave to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies the defence of the policy of the Government in assenting, upon the urgent representations of Governor Pine, to send reinforcements to Cape Coast Castle, with the object, if necessary, to prosecute war with the King of the Ashantees. He thought his right hon. Friend could show that that was not an unwise decision, but he (the Marquess of Hartington) did not wish to go into the question of policy, as he only desired to point out what were the arrangements to forward to Colonel Conran these reinforcements. In December last it was decided that they should be sent. No time was then lost in applying to the Admiralty on the subject, and getting a transport to take them, and the Tamar was ready to sail from England on the 8th of January. It must not be supposed that it was in the power of the Tamar to sail to a certain place in the West Indies in order to take up troops there and at once to convey them to Cape Coast Castle. On the contrary, one of the great difficulties in providing these reinforcements was that of ascertaining at what station in the West Indies they could be taken without inconvenience and without delay. The consequence was that the Tamar had to proceed to Barbadoes, Trinidad, and thence to Jamaica. She made her final departure from Honduras on the 3rd of March, and arrived at Cape Coast Castle on the 9th of April. Owing to that circuitous course, and its being uncertain whence the troops could be taken, it was quite impossible that the Government could make an accurate calculation of the time when they would arrive at Cape Coast Castle; and with reference to the statement that proper accommodation was not provided for the troops on their arrival there, he must observe that it was the intention of the Governor, in conjunction with Colonel Conran, who had made all his preparations for the invasion of the Ashantee territory, not to delay twenty-four hours after the arrival of the reinforcements, but immediately to march up the troops landed from the Tamar to the River Prah, and after striking a blow against the King of the Ashantees, the colonel hoped to return to the coast within a short period, and before the setting in of the rainy season. The reinforcements would then have been sent back to the West Indies. The Tamar did not arrive as soon by about a fortnight as Colonel Conran had expected, and besides there occurred that which he believed the House would find to be the real cause of the ill success of the whole enterprise—the rainy season commenced at least two months or six weeks earlier than had been expected. In fact last year, as appeared from the despatches on the table, very little rain indeed had fallen up to the month of August. The rainy season, as he was informed by the best authorities acquainted with that climate, did not generally commence till the end of April or the beginning of May. In the present year, however, it set in with great severity in the middle of March. He believed that it was known that the seasons were extremely uncertain in tropical climes, but he was informed that the rainy season was rarely known to begin so early as in the present year, and the Correspondence on the table showed that neither Colonel Conran nor Governor Pine anticipated that it would commence before they were able to begin the expedition into the interior of the country. If, however, Colonel Conran had been able to send the troops with the reinforcements into the interior, that circumstance would not have relieved him from the duty of making the necessary accommodation for them on the coast, because it was expected that they would come back there in a short time. In respect to the matter of accommodation for the troops, he had to state that in October last the War Office despatched a very able officer of Engineers, Major Clarke, to the Gold Coast, with the object of making such arrangements as might be found to be necessary for the increased number of troops intended to be maintained on the coast of Africa. His instructions were to report to the War Office what alterations and extensions of existing buildings would be necessary, and he was also authorized, with the sanction of the officer in command of the troops, to expend certain sums on services immediately needed. It was true that Major Clarke, when he arrived at Cape Coast Castle, was not aware that those reinforcements of seven companies had been ordered; but his instructions had reference to a very much larger number of troops than were at Cape Coast Castle at the time. Of course it was impossible for Major Clarke to enter upon any large works at once, because he had not funds at his disposal for extensive works, but he had all the funds which the House of Commons had enabled to be placed at his disposal. Still the labour and the necessary materials were not at hand, and therefore it was necessary that existing buildings should be adapted to the accommodation of troops. Major Clarke found that at Cape Coast Castle, Accra, and other stations, there was an abundance of public buildings and private houses well fitted to accommodate a very large number of troops. He had seen a sketch made by Major Clarke of certain private houses at Accra which he proposed to convert into barracks at a small expense. Unfortunately, however, a short time previously to the arrival of the reinforcements from the West Indies the small-pox broke out very badly in some parts of the town of Cape Coast Castle, and the buildings destined for the accommodation of the troops were on that account unavailable, and it became necessary to place the men under canvas or to take advantage of such other buildings as might be obtained at some distance from the infected part of the town. Some hon. Gentlemen who seem amused at mention of the small-pox might, perhaps, be more amused at the circumstance that at Accra the houses intended by Major Clarke to be converted into temporary barracks were destroyed by an earthquake a short time before the arrival of the Tamar. Therefore there was no accommodation for the troops except such as might be provided by tents and some other houses, but he was informed that the troops from the Tamar only remained at that station under canvas for two days, and then almost every one was accommodated in houses. He thought that the statement he had made would show that there was no want of forethought on the part of the War Office in providing accommodation for the troops. Under the circumstances regular barracks could not be obtained, but an officer had been specially sent out to provide temporary accommodation. If, from unfortunate circumstances, that accommodation, suddenly and in a very short time before the arrival of the troops became unavailable, he really could not see how the Government could be held responsible for the unfortunate circumstances which had occurred.

The next allegation was that the commissariat arrangements were defective. With regard to those arrangements, it was reported, in August, 1863, after the arrival of the Megara, by the commissariat officer at Cape Coast, that there was considerable difficulty in procuring fresh meat—that it could not be procured oftener than twice a week. Subsequently, and on that representation, large issues of preserved meat were made from this country, and they had been continued up to the present time. In the campaign which took place in the year 1863 the Governor made great complaints against Major Cochrane about his delay and not having prosecuted the war with greater vigour. Major Cochrane represented that the great difficulty was in obtaining transport for the commissariat. In consequence orders were sent in October last to Assistant Commissary General Blanc, who was then serving at the Gambia, to proceed to Cape Coast Castle, in order, should the operations be continued, to organize a transport corps. That officer, who in all these transactions had fully borne out the high opinion previously entertained of him, did organize a transport corps, of between 700 or 800 men, and numbering ultimately 1,000 Natives, by means of which the troops were furnished with supplies, wherever they moved. With reference to the statement that had been made, that the troops lived at that time almost entirely on salt meat, the House would perhaps allow him to read a general order issued by Colonel Conran on the 23rd of January.

"The rations for the troops in the field will be as follows:—1 lb. biscuit, or 1 lb. flour, or  $1\frac{1}{2}$  lb. rice; 1 lb. salt meat or 1 lb. fresh meat, or  $\frac{1}{2}$  lb. preserved boiled beef without bone. Fresh meat or preserved meat to be issued every other day. The issue of biscuit, flour, and rice to be varied as often as circumstances will permit."

It could not be supposed that Colonel Conran would have published that general order to the troops if he had not first assured himself of the fact that there was fresh meat to be issued. He would not have ventured to ridicule the officers and men by holding out such expectations if he had had only salt meat at his disposal. On the 25th of January the officer commanding the troops reported to the Horse Guards that he was satisfied with the exertions of the commissariat, and strongly recommended Commissary General Blanc for promotion. The letters of Colonel Conran and Governor Pine abounded with expressions of their satisfaction with the completeness of the commissariat arrangements. They spoke in the highest terms not only of the personal exertions of Commissary General Blanc, but of the manner in which the commissariat service had generally been conducted. Under these circumstances, he could not see what weight could be attached to the complaints that had been brought forward with respect to the commissariat.

It had also been said that there was a great deficiency of fresh water. Owing to some negligence—on whose part he could not say—the tanks at Cape Coast Castle, which ought to have been sufficient to supply the garrison for some time, failed earlier than they should have done. In December the War Office learnt that the supply of water was not of a proper description, and orders were immediately given to send out a large quantity of filtering stones, and also, as soon as possible, a steam condensing apparatus believed to be capable of supplying 1,200 gallons a day. The condensing apparatus arrived in February, and orders were despatched by the Admiralty to one of the cruisers on the coast to send an engineer to assist in erecting it. The condensing apparatus was set up, but it did not succeed in producing as much fresh water as had been anticipated—it yielded, in fact, only some 500 gallons a day. That was, no doubt, unfortunate; but, at the same time, he did not see what the authorities at home could have done beyond sending out the best means within their knowledge for providing the troops with what was wanted.

It had further been alleged that the medical arrangements were imperfect. The number of troops at the station at no time exceeded 1,400, and there had never been fewer than six surgeons attached to the force; there had for some time been eight, and during the last five months there had been eleven and twelve. The hon. and gallant Member stated that, although twelve had been sent out, three had died, and three were invalided. He could only say that, according to the latest Returns, twelve medical officers were reported to be at Cape Coast Castle, and he had every reason to suppose that they were actually present and effective. For a force never exceeding 1,400 men, even in that unhealthy climate, a staff of twelve medical officers must be deemed amply sufficient. There had been no complaints of any deficiency in the medical or hospital stores or any article of that description required for the men. That there was an adequate supply of these things was proved by the reports, not only of officers on the spot, but of those who had come home to this country. The Returns further showed that medical comforts of all kinds had actually been issued to the sick in the hospitals, and therefore it was quite clear that a sufficient quantity had been provided. So far from there having been any deficiency in that respect, the officer commanding reported to the War Office in September last, that he had issued three general orders in the previous month relative to the formation of a military hospital wherein the sick were to be provided with all necessary comforts, and that the system established was then proving most beneficial to the sick soldier. To show that the troops were not at all so unprovided for as some hon. Members opposite imagined, he would read to the House the list of rations which were served out in the hospital, with the addition of such medical comforts as the surgeon deemed necessary:—Bread, beef or mutton, 1 lb.; or fowl, 12 oz.; or fish, 12 oz.; tea,  $\frac{1}{2}$  oz.; or coffee, 1 oz.; sugar, 2 oz.; vegetables, 4 oz.; rice, 3 oz.; pepper, salt, and butter. Since the notice had been placed on the paper, inquiries had been made of Staff Surgeon Schroeder, who had returned to this country, whether there had been at any period a deficiency in any of the medical or hospital stores. His reply was that they had been at one time short of castor oil, but that a supply had been immediately obtained from one of the ships off the coast, and more could have been got from the same source if needed. In fact, if there had been a lack of anything, one or other of the ships in the neighbourhood of the station would have provided it.

The hon. and gallant Member said the Government ought to have established a floating hospital. He had been informed, however, by those who had been at the station, that ships could not lie within three miles of Cape Coast Castle, that in all weathers the landing through the surf was a difficult, not to say dangerous, operation, that communication could not be maintained between the shore and the ships for more than four or five days at a time, and that when the weather was at all bad the surf was such that it would be quite impossible to transport sick or wounded men to a floating hospital. In camp equipments and other stores of that kind there had been no more deficiency than in the articles he had just mentioned. He would not detain the House with an enumeration of the stores, but from December last, bedsteads, blankets, tents, and so on, had been repeatedly sent out in large numbers. Not only had all requisitions been attended to without the slightest delay, but the wants of the troops were even anticipated by the Department at home. Such were the arrangements which had been made by the War Office, and he thought they were sufficient to show that the wants and comforts of the troops had not been neglected. If anything had been omitted to be done, it was quite clear, he thought, that complaints would have been heard on the subject; but although he had looked over a great many despatches which had been received from the Gold Coast he had not seen a single complaint—and he believed no such thing existed—either from the officer in command of the troops, from the Governor at the station, from the officer in charge of the commissariat, who was admitted on all hands to be a most active and energetic man, and who, if anything went wrong would not be likely to hold his tongue, or from the senior medical officer, or, indeed, from anybody else who was responsible to the Government or the War Office for the proper equipment of the troops under their charge. Nor could he imagine, had the Government been guilty of the negligence of which they were accused, that the officers in question would have kept the authorities at home in ignorance on the subject. It was easy for the hon. and gallant Gentleman to come down to the House and to say that such and such things had not been provided; and it was, of course, impossible for him to meet such a statement with a direct denial without a reference to those who were on the spot; but the fact that no complaint was made by those who were responsible for the health and comfort of the men was, he contended, a strong ground for supposing that no deficiency in reality existed. That being so, the War Office could scarcely be much to blame, however much the disastrous loss of life which had taken place was to be deplored.

The hon. and gallant Member had produced a great sensation—and a great sensation had no doubt been produced in the country—by moving for a list of the names of thirteen officers who had died at the station, and he believed it was supposed by many that those thirteen officers had died in consequence of the expedition against the King of Ashantee. Now, that expedition took place—and it was the only expedition against the King of Ashantee which the Government had sanctioned—during the spring. Of the thirteen officers who died in thirteen months—for the Returns extended from the May of last year to May of the present—six died last year. Of these, four died in Major Cochrane's campaign against the Ashantees, the repetition of which campaign was exactly that which it was the object of the Government, of Governor Pine, and of Colonel Conran to prevent. In 1863 no precaution was taken to prevent the Ashantees from entering the country under the protection of England. They did enter that country, destroyed several villages, and indulged, he believed, in great cruelty towards the Natives. It was in the endeavour to expel the King of the Ashantees and his forces from the British Protectorate that the troops under Major Cochrane had suffered so severely. He presumed, however, that if the territory was supposed to be under our protection, it would not be contended that we should allow the troops of the King of Ashantee or any other force to ravage it. [An hon. MEMBER: Denmark.] He was not aware that Denmark was under the British Protectorate; but to return to the list of those officers who had died, he found that one died on the 2nd of October, 1863, just after, he believed, he had landed from the West Indies, and the expedition against the King of Ashantee had nothing to do with his death. Another officer died on the 13th of February. He was civil commandant at a place that was a considerable distance from Cape Coast Castle; he never took any part against the Ashantees, and the expedition had nothing to do with his death. A staff assistant surgeon and two officers died either on the expedition or at sea coming home, having been invalided in consequence of the expedition. Another officer died at Lagos in March, and was never in the expedition. Captain Hay, the lamented brother of the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, had not, so far as he could ascertain, ever taken any part in the expedition against the King of Ashantee. He had volunteered to command certain troops in a totally different service at another station on the coast; and although his death might be remotely connected with the hostilities going on against the King of Ashantee, still it could not legitimately be said to have been caused by that expedition, to which, as far as he could make out, the Motion alone pointed. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members might cry "No!" but he apprehended that the maintenance of a certain force on the Gold Coast was not to be made a ground of accusation against the Government because of the pestilential nature of the climate. The occupation of that station had continued for many years, and under other Administrations than the present. But, be that as it might, three officers, and three officers only, had, so far as he could make out, died in consequence of the projected invasion of the Ashantee territory; and when that loss was compared with the frightful rate at which Europeans annually died at the Gold Coast, whether engaged in active operations or not, he did not see—much as the loss was to be deplored—that any sufficient grounds for the impeachment of the Government were furnished. The number of rank and file who had died was stated in a Return which had been laid before the House, but he could not follow the hon. and gallant Gentleman in that part of his speech in which he attempted to prove that a certain extra number was missing. The discrepancy which had been pointed out was, he thought, owing to the fact that the first Return gave the number of troops landed on the Gold Coast, while the other statement related only to the actual number remaining at Cape Coast Castle. At all events, the Returns which he had laid on the table had been procured from the Adjutant General, and he had no reason to doubt their accuracy. He wished he could give the House the actual number of the rank and file who had died during the progress of hostilities. Speaking from memory, however, he might state that the amount of the force at Cape Coast Castle was on the 1st of May 1,299 rank and file, and that out of that force only sixty-four were sick, while only twelve had died within a month. That rate of mortality was no doubt high, but not so high, he thought, compared with that which took place ordinarily in a regiment at home as to justify its being put forward as a reason for an appeal to the House of Commons to pass a Vote of Censure on the Government.

The last charge made against the Government was that there had been unnecessary delay in sending out a transport to bring a certain portion of the troops home, but with that part of the question his noble Friend the Secretary for the Admiralty would be better able to deal. He might, however, state, that although it was no doubt desirable that the troops should be removed as soon as possible, yet the fact of their being compelled to remain at the station for a few days was not, after all, so very terrible a trial, as he had shown that the sanitary state of the rank and file of the black troops was not very bad. As to the officers, he could only say that the mail steamers touched at Cape Coast every month, and that any officer who might not be sufficiently strong to continue there in the performance of his duty was at once sent home; indeed, his superior officer had no power to keep him at the station if the medical officer in charge certified that he was not fit to remain. Whatever delay there might have been in sending the transport, there was none in sending out instructions that the forces should retire from the interior. Those orders went out by the first mail after the announcement which his right hon. Friend made in that House. The Governor and the officer commanding the forces were directed to withdraw the troops from the interior to the comparatively healthy coast; the stores were not even brought away; they were to be distributed among the friendly Natives. There was no delay in sending out those orders. Besides that, the officer commanding the troops, Colonel Conran, knowing that there was no prospect of the resumption of active operations, would have no scruple in allowing any officer whose health had been impaired to retire at once, and therefore he could not think that the officers were at all likely to suffer from the small delay which had occurred in sending out the transport. These were the facts with reference to the arrangements made by the authorities at home for the conduct of the war, and these were the events which had occurred during the expedition. He asked the House whether, upon such a statement as was made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, so totally unsupported by documents, and so full of vague assertions of which no proof was offered, they were, in the face of such an explanation as he had been able to make, prepared to agree to what amounted to a very severe Vote of Censure upon the Government. Because, although the hon. and gallant Member had, no doubt, in order to secure the votes of some hon. Members who would not have liked to support a Resolution in such extremely strong language, modified the terms of that which he first submitted to the House, he maintained that the Motion before them was as directly a Vote of Censure upon the Departments which were concerned with the business. Nor had the hon. and gallant Member retracted, explained, or modified in any way the assertion which he made the other evening, that he should be able to prove that the deaths of all the thirteen officers, a list of whose names had been laid upon the table, were owing to the criminal incapacity of Her Majesty's Government. He (the Marquess of Hartington) had shown how few of these officers' deaths were in any way owing to the expedition itself, and he could show that the number of officers who died or were invalidated annually, even when they were not engaged in active operations, amounted to 50 per cent of the number of Europeans upon the coast. The hon. and gallant Member had not substantiated his statement; he had not attempted to prove the assertion which he had made, and which the facts which he (the Marquess of Hartington) had stated to the House entirely disproved. Although the terms of the Motion had been modified, its purport and tenour remained the same, and he trusted that the House would not only refuse to assent to it, but would negative it by such a majority as would mark its sense of the conduct of the hon. and gallant Member in bringing forward charges of so grave a character in the reckless manner he had done.

M<sup>r</sup>. HENRY SEYMOUR said, it was one of the disadvantages of the manner in which the Government had been formed, that the heads of neither the naval nor the military Departments were in that House, and that the noble Lord, whose abilities and industry he did not dispute, but who was not a Cabinet Minister, and who had had nothing to do with the planning of this expedition, and was not responsible for carrying it out, had been called upon to reply to the speech of the hon. and gallant Member opposite. It was not surprising that his explanations had been very unsatisfactory, and afforded no answer to the statement of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. To take up one point, the noble Lord said that he had no official information that any of the medical officers beyond the usual number in the colony had died. If he could show from a letter which he had reason to believe came from a very high authority, in the colony, that nearly half the medical force were either dead or invalidated, and that there were at present only two medical men in the colony who were fit for duty, and that those two were coloured men, of what value would the noble Lord's other assertion be? There was often a great difference between authentic information and official information. They might obtain authentic information from private sources, but the official information was sure to be withheld until the time when any such debate as that had passed over. That applied to officials of both parties, and it was a circumstance which was not fair either to the House, to the country, or to the Government. It would be far better to make a clean breast of the matter, and rely upon their general abilities, which would probably induce the country to overlook any laches which there had been in the matter. The letter to which he had referred, and which he was assured was written by a gentleman who was high in authority at Cape Coast Castle, was dated "May 12, 1864," and came by the last mail. It contained this passage—

"The troops arrived at the Prah about the 1st of February, and on the 8th of April, when the Tamar anchored in Cape Coast roadstead, there were fourteen officers of the 4th West at the Castle; and such was their state of health, that at the dinner given to  fête  the arrival of the reinforcement, only one was able to leave his bed and meet them, and even he was in a dreadful state of debility. Out of twenty-six officers who left the coast for the field, fifteen, or thereabouts, have been invalidated home in a very precarious state, three have died, and four are obliged to keep their bed, though not sufficiently ill to be invalidated. Of the soldiers many have died, principally from dysentery. A great many are so weak that, in all probability, they will not be fit for active service in the field for the next twelve months. Of the twelve medical officers on the coast, three have been invalidated, one has died, and three are still prostrated with fever."

He was told that that letter came from a gentleman who had special knowledge of the subject. ["Name, name."] He was not permitted to mention the gentleman's name, but it would tell very badly for the Government if the information turned out to be correct. The noble Lord did not deny that the tanks were out of order. There were magnificent tanks sufficient for the supply of all the men that were sent; but they had been allowed to go so entirely out of repair that they were used as the common sewer, and it was not until the second year of the war that the distilling apparatus was sent out. The noble Lord said that the men were supplied with blankets and bedsteads; but he did not deny that they were not supplied with water. He did not deny that the Tamar arrived after the rains had begun, nor that there had been a drought at Cape Coast Castle for twenty months, and that the rain this year might have been expected much earlier than usual. He wished to make a few remarks upon the general conduct of the expedition. It was planned by the Cabinet in London. It did not depend upon Governor Pine or any one else in the colony. He sent home his project for an expedition to Ashantee; that was confirmed by the Colonial Minister, who sent it to the War Office, and ought to have consulted the Cabinet upon it. It was to be presumed that he did consult the Ministers of the Departments which would be concerned in carrying it out. A war to be conducted from Cape Coast Castle in the interior of Africa was no slight undertaking, more especially in the case of Ashantee, which had many unpleasant reminiscences for Englishmen. It was only forty years since Sir Charles M'Carthy was routed with 1,000 men, and lost his head, the skull of which was still, he believed, used as a drinking-cup in Ashantee. Before that there had been another great disaster to the English, who had for many years been literally obliged to pay tribute for their possessions along the coast. So that the Government, in sanctioning an expedition against Ashantee, a country full of jungle and impenetrable woods, ought to have been aware that it was no light undertaking. It ought to have been made, if it was not, a Cabinet question, and ought to have been the subject of complete and efficient concert between the different Departments of the Government. Arrangements ought to have been made as to the number of troops which were to be sent, and the time at which they were to be despatched, and the proper officers ought to have been sent to prepare the way for the arrival of these reinforcements. Up to December the reinforcements which arrived were tolerably well provided. Assistant Commissary Blanc, who was sent out, appeared to have been an energetic officer, and he got ready his land transport corps with great ability. Every soldier had a porter to carry his knapsack and provisions. But the case was quite different with the detachments which followed, and a sufficient transport corps could not be got together for them. The noble Marquess said the Tamar had to go here and to go there; but if the Government intended to carry out that expedition, it was their duty to know that the transports could bring the troops to that coast, if not by a certain day, by a certain week, and that when they arrived arrangements had been made to receive them. The noble Marquess did not dispute that the expedition was a perfect failure. As far as could be ascertained from other sources than the meagre despatches, he thought the plan of Governor Pine and Colonel Conran, an able soldier, was a good one, and that the only fault was in depending upon the Government for the arrival of the Tamar. Colonel Conran advanced to the Prah, but the rains coming on and the Tamar not arriving he was obliged to return to the coast. How did all that contrast with the arrangements of a good general, like Napoleon for instance, who took care in planning an expedition that his troops should arrive at the place intended on a certain day, and made the minutest arrangements for their reception, and then success attended his efforts! It was lamentable to see the slovenly way in which the whole thing had been managed, through that very want of organization in the different Government Departments which led to such misfortunes in the Crimean war. He regretted to see no improvement made in that respect, because if that state of things continued, and we should have to send out a much larger and more important expedition than that to Ashantee, as, for example, one to Denmark or the Baltic, further misfortunes might be expected to occur. Surely it was not impossible for the Prime Minister to see that the various Departments did their duty and acted in proper concert. It was no answer to say that a constitutional Government must be placed in a permanent inferiority to a despotic monarchy, and that it could not exhibit the requisite unity of action in these cases. Why could not the Colonial Minister have said, "I approve this war with Ashantee, but I must have certain troops landed by a certain day." And why could not the War and other Departments then have set about making all the necessary arrangements for the landing and comfort of the troops? If that had been done the disaster would not have happened. All the facts had been admitted by the noble Marquess, and considering the swampy marsh on which the troops were located, and the little provision which had been made for them, it was strange that the mortality was not greater. An able Commissioner, Major Ord, was sent out some time ago to inquire into the water at Cape Coast Castle, and he reported that nothing could be easier than to obtain a constant supply; that not only were there the tanks formerly placed there by the Portuguese, and which were out of order, but he recommended that Artesian wells should be bored, and for a small part of the expenditure incurred on the fortifications good water might be brought into Cape Coast Castle. The noble Marquess had overstated the mortality on these stations. The medical Returns given by his own Department stated that in the year 1859-60 the ratio per thousand at Sierra Leone was 579·6 admitted to hospital, and 24·48 deaths. In Gambia the proportions were 831·3 admitted to hospital, and 30·13 deaths; whereas on the Gold Coast the proportion per thousand admitted to hospital was 657·1, and the deaths were only 16·89. Dr. Clarke, who had been twenty years at Sierra Leone and the Gold Coast, stated in his medical report that the climate of the latter might be favourably compared with that of the former. The climate, therefore, was not really so deadly, provided the ordinary appliances necessary for preserving human life, whether in that great city or on the coast of Africa, were duly attended to. He did not look on that as a party question. As a Liberal Member of Parliament he wished to see improvements made in all the Departments of the State. He could not support the Government in all cases, whether right or wrong. When faults were signalized against the Government and not disproved, and when they were likely if repeated hereafter to work detrimentally to the public interests, he had a perfect right to say, in the words of that Motion, that he deeply regretted that better provision was not made for the arrival of the troops on that unhealthy coast, and that there had been a deplorable want of organization in the different Departments. The question affected the lives and interests of many Englishmen, and therefore could not be regarded as a party one. He was sure the country would not view it in that light, and even if some Member of the Cabinet was not able to answer, he would not say the accusations but the observations that had been made on that subject, the carrying of the Motion could not be fairly treated as a censure on the Government generally. If such a censure were intended, the general conduct of the Government and not merely its conduct in that particular instance, ought to be submitted to the consideration of the House. The last accounts were that the troops at Cape Coast Castle were put on an allowance of a pint of brackish water per day, and that there was no shelter for them. According to the Colonial Secretary's admission, there were twice the number of troops there that there was accommodation for, and therefore he had ordered their removal from Cape Coast Castle immediately. That was as good as saying that they ought never to have been sent there at all. In that case there had unquestionably been a fault, and that must rest on the organization of the Departments of the Government. All Governments, however, committed faults, and he did not see why the condemnation of particular laches should be viewed as a general expression of want of confidence in the administration of the noble Lord.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, there had been nothing in the speech of the noble Marquess with which he was more struck than the allegation that when these troops were sent out to Cape Coast Castle there was no intention of carrying on a war. If no such intention existed, what was the good of sending out such a number of troops at all? To a right understanding of the question it was necessary to discover by whose authority the war was entered into, and the date of the orders sent from the Colonial Office empowering Governor Pine to make war in the Ashantee country. The despatches presented to Parliament were very few, and among those of Governor Pine laid on the table were frequent references to documents which had not been produced. The noble Marquess, however, must remember that the state of things existing when Colonel Conran landed was but a continuance of events which occurred in 1863, when Major Cochrane was in command. [Hear!] The noble Lord the First Minister generally made a point of defending his subordinates, and for the honour and credit of his Administration he hoped no attempt would be made in that instance to cast the blame on Governor Pine. ["Hear, hear!" from the Treasury Bench.] He was delighted to hear that assurance, and should proceed to refer to such portions of the official correspondence as were in the hands of Members. The first despatch from the Duke of Newcastle entirely approved the Governor's refusal to surrender the fugitive. The next despatch, of the 18th of May, said—

"Sir, I have received your despatch, No. 83, of the 15th ult., reporting the threatening movements of the Ashantees, and the steps which you have taken to resist an invasion, and I have much pleasure in noticing the calmness and prudence as well as the energy which you have shown in these trying circumstances."

That was an approval of the Governor's policy. The next despatch, of the 22nd of August, was written after Major Cochrane's expedition; and he greatly regretted that the noble Marquess in alluding to that part of the subject should have cast an unworthy reflection upon a gallant officer, who was placed in a position of very great difficulty, without the means of performing the duty he was expected to discharge. Writing to Governor Pine on the 2nd of August, the Duke of Newcastle said—

"You report the withdrawal of the enemy without molestation, after having inflicted destructive ravages on the territory under British protection. It is much to be feared that this impunity may prove an encouragement to fresh aggressions."

"Your own conduct in this trying emergency appears to have been all that could be desired. You betrayed no undue wish to interpose in military matters, but when accounts reached you from all sides of an inactivity which was injurious to the public interest, you hastened to the scene of action, and there endeavoured to produce more resolution, and provided by your own influence some of the material aids from the Natives which had been represented to be wanting, the whole being done at great risk to yourself from the attendant exposure and anxiety. For such efforts, made in such a spirit, it is my pleasing duty to convey to you my cordial approbation."

That amounted to a distinct approval of all that had been done. ["No, no!"] Right hon. Gentlemen opposite appeared to think that despatch did not convey approval of the Governor's policy. What did they say to the despatch of the 21st of December, 1863, written by Sir F. Rogers, in the absence and by the authority of the Secretary of State?—

"I transmit for your information an extract of a letter which by my desire has been addressed to the War Office, explaining the grounds on which I have recommended that your application should be complied with, and I have to request that you will guide yourself by the principles therein stated. In case the expected Ashantee invasion takes place, my hope is that you and the officer in command will be able to inflict so severe a punishment upon the invaders as will remove the disastrous impressions caused by their impunity when they lately ravaged the protected territory, and will deter them from any future aggression. But should no opportunity be found of striking such a blow without entering the Ashantee territory, you are not to regard yourself as absolutely prohibited from doing so under any circumstances, and from advancing, as far as the utmost consideration for the safety of the troops would permit, for the purpose of obtaining reparation and securing the peace of the Protectorate."

There was not only approval of what had been already done, but a distinct and positive incitement of Governor Pine, who required no incitement at all, to prosecute this terrible war. In the letter to the Colonial Office, alluded to in that despatch, he found the following passage:—

"His Grace feels that he cannot refuse to Governor Pine a conditional authority to strike a blow within the Ashantee territory, if such a blow can be struck without making any other or further advance than in his own opinion and that of the officer in command may be consistent with the utmost consideration for the safety of the troops, and provided also he can satisfy himself that the result will be to remove the disastrous impressions caused by the impunity of the Ashantees when they last ravaged the protected territory, and to obtain reparation and secure the peace of the Protectorate."

How, after reading those despatches, the noble Lord could say that these troops did not go out to carry on a war he was at a loss to understand. The despatch from Governor Pine urged as strongly as possible that additional troops should be sent out. Ten weeks elapsed before any notice was taken of that application, and when the troops did arrive they landed two months too late to be of the least use for that season, and six months too soon for any future campaign. Those charged with the interests of the navy must have known the nature of that coast, from which at a particular season vapours arise that are absolutely poisonous, and winds of the most destructive character prevail. Yet it was to that unhealthy coast that men were sent to live in tents unprovided with any commensurate appointments. He characterized this expedition to the Gold Coast as part of the dangerous policy of meddling everywhere pursued by Her Majesty's Government; and as to the allegation that war was not contemplated when these troops were sent out, could it be seriously argued that it was unnecessary to take any precautions affecting their health because they were not meant to embark in hostilities? His noble Friend on the Treasury Bench must know, moreover, that the water on the Gold Coast was so objectionable as to produce what was called the Guinea worm. Therefore, on every ground, whether the troops were sent out for the purposes of war or not, the Government were responsible for the loss of life which had occurred. Adding together the number of officers and men originally at Cape Coast Castle, those landed from the Megara in 1863, and those from the Tamar in 1864, the Government Return gave a total of 1,809 officers and men. Of these, but 1,396 were accounted for, and, therefore, on the figures supplied by the Government itself there was a deficiency of 413 officers and men. He could, perhaps, supply the House with a few statistics on that point. Two expeditions went up the country, one of 700 men, of which number 180 were dead within five days; the other, of 400 men, 200 of whom died or were disabled in ten days. The fate of previous expeditions might have warned the Government against entering into such an enterprize. They ought to have known that of 1,000 men who formed M'Carthy's expedition only fifty returned to Cape Coast Castle. They ought also to have known that the Ashantees were most remarkable as a warlike, energetic race. From a statement which he had received it appeared that the Ashantee monarch had a considerable regard for the faith of treaties, and did not commence war without negotiation, and that the Ashantees were the most civilized people on the coast. They would find, from the blue-book, that, instead of conciliating that people, they had done nothing but offend them. In 1829 Sir George Murray established the settlement at Cape Coast Castle, and two Committees—one in 1837, the other in 1842—had strongly recommended conciliatory conduct towards the Natives. It was certainly matter for regret that they should have carried on the war in that quarter so heedlessly, so wantonly, and with so little consideration for the Natives, and even for our troops. Not the smallest information had been given to Parliament that such a war was going on. The whole country was totally ignorant that any war had taken place, and must have heard with regret and indignation of the sacrifice of life that had taken place. The Government had incurred a fearful responsibility, and he trusted the Resolution would be carried, as a protest against perpetual interventions and meddlings which led to nothing but the destruction of human life. At any rate, he trusted it would prove a lesson to the Government to take care not again to embark in conflicts with barbarous tribes in the interior of Africa, without making proper provision for the health and comfort of our troops.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, he had originally intended to move an Amendment to the Resolution of the hon. Member (Sir John Hay), but he found that he was prevented by the forms of the House from doing so. He would, therefore, briefly state to the House the reasons why he could not approve the Resolution, but he wished first to express his heartfelt sympathy for the bereavement which the hon. Baronet had sustained in the loss of his brother, and also his sympathy with the families of those officers who died in the performance of their duty. He would now endeavour to give a brief summary of what had taken place. The Ashantee King demanded, under an extradition treaty, that a slave who had escaped should be given up to him. The Governor required that evidence should be produced that he had committed the crimes with which he had been charged, and on the King's refusal Governor Pine, in the cause of humanity, declined to accede to the demand. The King of Ashantee threatened to invade British territory, and in the spring of 1863 he invaded the protected territory of the Fantees, a friendly tribe. Major Cochrane was sent with a force of coloured troops, officered by Europeans, to encourage the Fantees in resisting the Ashantees. From some cause or other Major Cochrane failed to come to his post; the Ashantees in consequence overran the Fantee territory, massacred from 3,000 to 5,000 Natives, and then returned to their own territory. To prevent a recurrence of such attacks, Governor Pine submitted to the Duke of Newcastle the necessity of striking a blow. The Duke of Newcastle at first objected to an invasion of Ashantee territory, but in a despatch dated August 22, 1863, he said—of organizing a very large force, to consist of 2,000 disciplined soldiers, followed by upwards of 50,000 Natives, and of making with that army a regular invasion of the territory of Ashantee. I am not insensible of the encouragement which the unfortunate inaction of the troops and Native allies under Major Cochrane's command may afford to fresh aggressions by the Ashantees, but the proposal of a regular invasion to be made upon that nation, and of a march upon their capital, is too serious to admit of my encouraging it. I will merely say at present that I should feel very averse to its adoption, except in case of overruling necessity, and also after the report of some more competent military commander than anyone from whom there has yet been an opportunity of obtaining an opinion at the Gold Coast."

On the receipt of that despatch Governor Pine again wrote to the Secretary of State, urging the organization of a force to attack the Ashantees. The Duke of Newcastle, therefore, wrote a despatch to the War Office expressing his continued adhesion to the principle that all military proceedings on the West Coast of Africa should be measures of defence, and not of aggression. While, however, he gave to Governor Pine a conditional authority to enter the Ashantee territory, he enjoined upon him the utmost consideration for the safety of the troops. The Duke of Newcastle manifested the utmost desire that the troops should be cared for in every possible way. To charge the Government with culpable negligence was, under such circumstances, an accusation that would not hold water for a moment. Preparations were made by the Governor for the arrival of troops, and supplies of biscuit, ball-cartridge, and medical stores were provided. The Governor anticipated the arrival of an additional West India Regiment. He forwarded a portion of the troops up the country, where a dépôt of stores was formed. It was intended that the whole of the troops should have gone up and entered the Ashantee territory before the rainy season, in order to teach the King a lesson. The disasters which had occurred were to be attributed to the two facts, that the rainy season had set in one month earlier than was anticipated, and the Tamar, which was to convey the troops, arrived a month too late. The delay in the arrival of the vessel was not to be wondered at when it was recollected that the authorities at home had had to forward instructions to the West Indies for the troops to be collected at different spots. They had then to be transported across the Atlantic in the face of the trade winds. There was, therefore, nothing unusual or surprising in the troops arriving one month after the time they were expected. It was said that they were landed on the beach, but where else could they be landed? Cape Coast Castle was said to be a remarkably healthy spot, and, if so, the Government were not very much to be blamed if the men were placed under tents, seeing that there was no accommodation for them otherwise. The principal charge against the Government appeared to be that thirteen officers had died. The West India regiments were officered by Europeans, and every individual, men and officers alike, on such a coast usually passed through the hospital before they became acclimatized. He had seen numbers of Europeans who had been in Africa, and coloured gentlemen also, who had passed through the hospitals, and after that were quite able to bear the climate. It should be remembered that European officers were in the habit of exchanging into West Indian regiments, knowing that the mortality was greater, but with the view of procuring rapid promotion. Many years ago, when he was a subaltern in the army, he applied for an exchange into a West Indian regiment with that object. If that were so, he did not see why people should cry out because those men went to an unhealthy climate, where they had to run their chance. His opinion was, that a number of men who had been acclimatized should be kept in the forts during the rainy season, and in that way the mortality among the troops would be greatly reduced. He could not but say that the Government of the Coast had been very dilatory in making preparations for the transport of troops and opening up the country by roads, which would be useful not only for military purposes, but also for promoting commerce; and it had been practically shown that roads could be constructed there at an expense of only £35 a mile. Another way by which the security of the protected territories might be promoted was by stopping the supplies procured by the Ashantees of arms, ammunition, and salt. There were 150 miles of the Volta navigable, and the Ashantees had been able to procure supplies by means of that river; but it would have been very easy for us to blockade its mouth, and prevent the enemy supplying themselves from that source. There was another source, also, from which the Ashantees procured supplies—namely, from the Dutch settlements, which he believed were free ports. But arrangements might be made by which the transport of arms and ammunition from the Dutch ports might be put a stop to, and he trusted the Colonial Office would endeavour to effect something in that way. With respect to the army surgeons, some ten or twelve had been sent out, two of the most competent of whom were coloured, and they were the only persons who had not been seriously affected by fever, and had not been prevented from performing their duties. That was a most important point, because, if we were to keep troops on that coast it would be essential that we should employ coloured surgeons. There were many other posts also in which coloured persons might be employed as engineers, and for instance, in the making of roads, and thus an opportunity might be found for the development of the intellect of the coloured people. It was much to be regretted that Governor Pine's health had not admitted of his remaining at Cape Coast until the arrival of the troops. Had he been there he would probably have said that the season was too advanced to undertake hostilities, and would have taken upon himself the responsibility of ordering them to a more healthy station. Sierra Leone was unhealthy on the shore, but excellent barracks had been erected on the hills, and since that time there had been little or no sickness among the troops there. Had the troops been sent there they might have escaped without any suffering. Complaints had been made that the Gladiator was unable to take all the troops away that ought to be removed. There need be no uneasiness on that head, inasmuch as the Rattlesnake, under Commodore Wilmot, was hovering about the coast, and could be made available for the accommodation and conveyance of the troops which the Gladiator could not find room for. He trusted that he had succeeded in showing to the House that there had not been any culpable negligence on the part of the Government, as some hon. Gentlemen opposite supposed. It was certainly the intention of the Duke of Newcastle to take every care possible of the health and comfort of the troops. Under all those circumstances, he thought that the House ought to express an opinion which would be satisfactory to the relatives of those who had unfortunately fallen in this expedition, to the effect that Her Majesty's Government had done nothing more than was clearly their duty.

Lord Alfred Churchill

MR. LIDDELL said, he agreed in the opinion which had been expressed by the hon. Member for Poole, that the question involved in the Motion could not and ought not to be made a party question. It appeared to him that the lives of their soldiers were as dear to the Gentlemen sitting upon one side of the House as to those who were sitting on the other. And because he believed that the lives of the soldiers had been unnecessarily sacrificed by the neglect of the common precautions which the War Department ought to have taken and the insufficiency of the arrangements made for their reception, that he, as a Member of that House, intended to give his vote in favour of the Resolution. When military operations were undertaken, that House ought to be satisfied upon two material points. The first was, that there was a necessity for war; and the second, that if military operations were necessary, proper precautions and safeguards had been made for the safety and protection of the troops which were sent abroad. He repeated they ought to be satisfied upon both those points. Now, if he wanted information as to the opinion of the Government on the necessity of the war, he would find its necessity denied in the despatch written by the Colonial Secretary a few days ago. If he wanted an assurance that proper precautions had not been taken for the safety of the troops, he would find it in the speeches of the noble Lord who represented the War Department in that House. The noble Marquess had told them that the War Office could not be expected to know that there was a scarcity of water at Cape Coast Castle. Now, had that been a fortuitous expedition thrown upon an unknown coast, such an observation might be taken as an excuse, though a bad one. But that was not the case, inasmuch as the country in question was a permanent station which for many years had been in the possession of the British Crown. And yet the noble Lord said that the War Office could not be expected to know that there was a want of water in the place. The noble Lord, to his (Mr. Liddell's) amazement, told the House that it was impossible to provide barracks for the troops sent there upon the emergency. Well, if it were impossible to provide barracks for the troops at that station, those troops should not have been sent to a coast so notorious for its insalubrity. It appeared to him that the noble Lord by those observations had used the strongest argument in support of the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member. He (Mr. Liddell) could not forget that the noble Lord was a Member of the Government, who had a short time ago given a conditional authority to Governor Pine to strike what he called a blow against the Ashantee power. The Governor at that time was engaged in the largest schemes of war and aggrandizement. He was engaged in raising an army of 50,000 Natives, to be supported by 2,000 European troops. That in itself was a gigantic project. It was at this time and under those circumstances the Governor received conditional authority to carry the war into the Ashantee territory. An ominous sentence had fallen from the lips of the noble Lord representing the War Department, when he told the House that a correspondence had recently passed between the Colonial Government and the War Office on the subject of a permanent increase of the troops upon the West Coast of Africa. He (Mr. Liddell) had heard that announcement with great alarm as well as disappointment after the speech the noble Lord had delivered in that House. It was necessary to say a few words with regard to the position of the British at Cape Coast Castle. They had heard that place spoken of as being a military station, but it was more. It was the seat of justice for a vast country in the interior of Africa, and the place of a court of appeal and arbitration for an enormous Native population. Laws were there framed, ordinances were passed, and justice administered by Englishmen, presided over by an English Judge, in concert with a conclave of Native chiefs. When laws were framed in so unusual a manner and justice administered in so peculiar a form, he was reminded of what Earl Grey had written upon this subject only twelve years ago. That distinguished nobleman, among the greatest of our statesmen, said, "Our authority rests entirely on the moral ascendancy of those exercising it, and the willing obedience of the people." But when that willing obedience ceased and our moral ascendancy waned, there was nothing left but to support our authority by the sword. When he heard, then, the noble Under Secretary of the War Department talk of a permanent increase of the troops at the station in question it might, he thought, be taken as a sign that our moral ascendancy was really on the wane, and that the time was not far distant when our authority, which had heretofore rested upon the willing obedience of the people, must be supported by the point of the bayonet. A protectorate, so long as we exercised it with the consent of the people, was a proud title for England, who thus became the civiliser of rude populations and the teacher of Christianity. But the moment he heard that we had become engaged in a war with the people under our care, he felt that all the advantages of that protectorate were passing away, and our moral ascendancy was extinct. He should give his vote for the Motion, because he firmly believed, and he was sure the country would also believe when they read the details of that unhappy expedition, that many valuable lives had been unnecessarily sacrificed. He hoped the House would gravely take into its consideration our position as to the protectorate of a vast Native population. The war had arisen from a neighbouring sovereign, whose power we had learnt to dread, exercising what he believed to be his sovereign rights. He claimed that one of his subjects should be handed over to him, not as a fugitive slave, but as a criminal, according to the laws of Ashantee, and we had gone to war with him in opposition to the exercise of that sovereign right. But they should remember that the climate of the coast of Africa was the worst climate in the world, and our troops in penetrating the interior had to meet with pestilential jungles, dense forests, and a very warlike people. He, therefore, asked the House to pause before they encouraged such proceedings; and, above all, he asked them to mark by their votes their sense of the incompetency and carelessness of the mode in which these troops had been thrown on the shores of the Gold Coast under the direction of the authorities at the War Office.

Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he rose to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the course which the debate had taken, to offer an explanation of the conduct of his noble Friend the Duke of Newcastle in giving his sanction to the measures adopted by the Governor of the Gold Coast for the protection of the people placed under British protection. While he was far from wishing to avoid any responsibility that might justly lie on himself as subordinate to the noble Duke, the late Colonial Secretary, he begged to say that the cautious and qualified sanction extended to the Governor of the Gold Coast was given by the immediate direction of the noble Duke. He made that statement because it was the truth, and because he knew that the noble Duke would be the last man to avoid the responsibility of his acts. Having made that statement as the foundation of what he had to say, he now wished, in justification of Her Majesty's Government, and especially of his noble Friend, to remind the House of the position of the Government in respect to the Gold Coast. Remarks had been made implying that the British Government, in sanctioning these hostilities, small in themselves but lamentable on account of the loss of life, had been guilty of unwarrantable interference in the affairs of some of the Native tribes. Such was not the case. What they had done had been in fulfilment of a recognized obligation undertaken by the British Government. Down to the year 1842, with one short exception, the management of our forts and settlements on the Gold Coast had been for two centuries in the hands of a company of English merchants. In 1824 the British Government assumed for a time the management of the settlements, and undertook to protect the people of the adjacent territories against their cruel and sanguinary oppressor the King of Ashantee. In the course of these operations England had to lament the death of a brave man, Sir Charles McCarthy, and the loss of many troops. The result, however, was that the King of Ashantee was reduced to terms, and compelled to renounce all claims over the tribes which now remained under the British protectorate. The Imperial Government, having restored peace and tranquillity (which had lasted, strange to say, till last year), after a few years gave back the management of the forts and settlements to the company of merchants. The great object of public policy, then, was to check the slave trade on that coast; but a suspicion arose that the company was not very zealous in promoting that end, and that private interest sometimes thwarted the desires of the public. Dr. Madden was despatched in 1840 to the settlement to institute inquiries, and his Report was submitted to a Committee of the House of Commons in 1842, under the Government of Sir Robert Peel. The first recommendation of that Committee was that the administration of the forts and settlements on the Gold Coast should be resumed by the Imperial Government. That recommendation was carried into effect by Sir Robert Peel and the Earl of Derby, the then Colonial Secretary. Since that time the Imperial Government had managed the settlements and exercised a considerable degree of authority over the people of the protected territories. Immediately after 1842 a Judge was appointed, under the name of Judicial Assessor, who had a most important civil and criminal jurisdiction over a large population, spread over a great extent of country. The people of the protected country were not indeed, in the eye of the law, British subjects, because, if they had been admitted to that position, it would have led to serious difficulties in regard to the domestic slavery which prevailed among them. But the Government interfered in some important respects, according to its own notions of what was right, with their laws and customs. For instance, domestic slavery was placed under regulations. Cruel treatment on the part of masters and the export of slaves were forbidden. Intertribal wars were repressed. Human sacrifices were prohibited. On the other hand, the British Government afforded the tribes protection against their ancient tyrant and oppressor the King of Ashantee. Such protection was implied in the very name—protectorate, and had been recognized as an obligation by successive Governments in this country, by Acts of Parliament, and by ordinances of the Crown. To show how entirely that was acknowledged he would read the observations of a Governor of the Gold Coast and an eminent Colonial Secretary. Sir W. Winniett wrote as follows:—

"Collectively, these States lend a willing deference to English authority: because, but for the English power, they would fall a prey to the ambition of the King of Ashantee, who is ready to find a pretext for war whenever his own strength warrants it, and the weakness of the Fantee tribes tempts him to the effort to extend his dominion to the sea coast, which is an object which the Ashantees are known to have at heart."

Earl Grey also said—

"Thus for several years internal wars have ceased, and the dread of British power and the knowledge that the united strength of all the chiefs in the district we protect, directed by British officers, and supported by a small disciplined force, would be promptly exerted to punish aggression upon any part of this territory, has been sufficient to restrain even the most powerful of the surrounding tribes or nations from attempting to injure those who acknowledge our authority."

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

Such was the state of things which existed when recent events occurred at the Gold Coast. He had heard some remarks from the hon. and gallant Member who brought forward the Motion, which seemed to mean that the Governor of the Gold Coast was in the wrong, and the King of Ashantee in the right as to the origin of the differences which had arisen. He could not conceive a more extraordinary assertion. What were the facts as to the origin of the dispute? In the beginning of 1863 the King of Ashantee—evidently as a pretext for a raid on the protected territories, because he changed his story several times—claimed the surrender of two of his subjects from the Governor of the Gold Coast. One was a slave-boy, who had fled from the cruelty of his master, the other was an old man, who was accused, without a tittle of evidence, of having appropriated some gold found in the dominions of Ashantee. The King, through his envoy, who came in great state, alluded to some supposed treaty under which these persons ought to be delivered up; but if such a treaty had existed, as it did not, it would have been more honoured in the breach than the observance. The Governor and the Executive Council of the settlement unanimously resolved that they could not consistently with common humanity and the honour of England give up these two Natives. The Governor, however, said that if the King would produce a shadow of prima facie proof that either had been guilty of any crime, he should be delivered up. No extradition treaty that ever was imposed the condition of surrendering criminals, under the circumstances of the present case, even to a civilized Government, far less to one which would certainly consign them to torture and death. His noble Friend the late Secretary of State approved the course which the Governor had pursued, and he trusted the House would see that he could have done nothing else. Such was the first step in these proceedings. The Governor and the Executive Council anticipated with some feelings of alarm that the course they had taken would subject them to invasion by the King of Ashantee; and before long such proved to be the case, for the King of Ashantee soon invaded the protected territory, burning and destroying all that came in his way. The Governor had then to consider what he should do, and fortunately he had the advantage of a very valuable adviser—Commodore Wilmot. He should like to read a passage from one of the Commodore's despatches to the Admiralty. It was not in the printed papers, because it did not come within the terms of the Motion, but it would be printed as soon as possible.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he rose to order. He apprehended it was a letter or a despatch that every one would be anxious to see and read, but as it was not in the hands of hon. Members he submitted the right hon. Gentleman was out of order in referring to it.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE: If the right hon. Baronet did not wish for information, he was ready to withhold it, but the right hon. Baronet would find that the opinion of Commodore Wilmot was so candid that perhaps, as a mere matter of party defence, it was rash to use it. The letter was not in any way connected with the terms of the hon. Gentleman's Motion, and it was only on the previous day that he knew of its existence. However, it should be at once laid on the table. This opinion was given on the 7th of April, 1863, before any hostile operations were undertaken, and when it was quite uncertain whether the King of Ashantee meant to invade the protectorate. Commodore Wilmot was most anxious that nothing should be done to involve the colony in war except it were absolutely necessary. In his letter he said—

"I placed before the Governor the great objections the English Government would have in entering upon a war with the King of Ashantee at any time, much more at the present moment; that their responsibilities would be very great, and who could see the end of such a war with one of the greatest Kings of Africa? Probably he would be joined by Dahomey and the Kings in the neighbourhood of Lagos and other places, who were always ready (urged on by Europeans adverse to English influence in Western Africa) to take up arms and keep us in a constant state of disquietude and alarm. I showed what the expense would be, the probable loss of life, the destruction of trade, and that whatever the result might be the future of this colony must be greatly retarded. I implored them to do all in their power, compatible with the honour of England and a sense of justice to those who claimed our protection, to avoid a war if possible, and at all events not to commence hostilities with their eyes shut before they had communicated with the King of Ashantee and found out what his intentions were. In the meantime I recommended preparations of every kind, and that arms, ammunition, &c., should be got ready with all despatch."

This advice was given on the supposition that the King of Ashantee did not really intend to invade our territory, but on the

"My opinions were asked and freely given. I said anything is better than this uncertainty. If you believe the rumour that the King's soldiers have passed the rivers and committed these unfriendly acts, despatch immediately a messenger to the King, and ask him why he permits this and what he means by such conduct. Ask him in plain terms if this is to be considered a declaration of war, and give him a certain time for the messenger to return. Should the messenger not return on the specified day, instantly form a camp in the country, call the tribes around you, and drive the rascals back again."

It soon became quite certain that the Ashantee troops were ravaging the protectorate, slaughtering and burning in all directions. Upon that the executive Government unanimously decided that the small force under Major Cochrane should take the field for the purpose of putting themselves at the head of the Native levies and protecting the tribes of the protectorate, with instructions at the same time to avoid hostile collision as far as possible, and not to assume that the Ashantees meant to encounter the British power. That was the least the Governor could do. When the Ashantees had invaded the protected territory, we were bound to do all in our power to co-operate with the protected tribes to resist the invasion. Then came a period of two months, of which it was difficult to give any clear account. A large force of Native levies was organized along with our small force under the command of Major Cochrane. He was far from wishing to dogmatize on Major Cochrane's management of the affair, for he knew perfectly the difficulties under which he laboured; but the result undoubtedly was that nothing effectual was done. The protected territories were laid waste, the inhabitants slaughtered, and the prestige of the British Government was seriously injured. So serious was the state of things, that on the 20th of April, 1863, Commodore Wilmot wrote—

"I am quite certain that had the Ashantees made a determined push two months ago towards the seaside they would have captured all our forts and desolated the country."

They did desolate the country although they did not take the forts. Major Cochrane, under circumstances of great difficulty, failed to make any effectual resistance, though Commodore Wilmot was not of opinion that, with good management, it would have been difficult to have attained a different result. On the 23rd of May, Commodore Wilmot wrote—

"A reinforcement of soldiers has been sent from the Gambia, and if the commanding officer of the troops now in the field will only act with vigour and judgment, I am quite certain that the Ashantee King will very soon be brought to terms, and that the future peace of the colony will be secured."

Governor Pine, thus disappointed at the result of the operations and miserable at the condition of the protected territory, wrote to the Duke of Newcastle in rather exaggerated language, asking him for large reinforcements, for the purpose of marching to Coomassie the Ashantee capital, which application was refused by the Duke. The Colonial Office had every reason to consider Governor Pine a gentleman of great judgment and experience, and his difficulties certainly were enormous, with hardly a European civilian to support him. In the course of the winter of last year, it became evident that the King of Ashantee would repeat the process of the previous year, and, unless measures were taken to prevent him, would invade and lay waste the protectorate. Under these circumstances, the Governor again assembled his Executive Council, and laid before them a plan which Colonel Conran, who had succeeded Major Cochrane as commander of the troops, had framed for the purpose of preventing an invasion. It was to defend two points on the frontier, so as to close the most accessible portion of the country to the invader. The plan was unanimously adopted by the Council, and in pursuance of it Colonel Conran advanced and formed a camp on the frontier, every possible precaution being taken for provisioning and hutting the troops. That camp had been established on the Prah before a conditional permission had been given by the Duke of Newcastle, which went the length of allowing the Governor to cross the frontier, if necessary. That permission was, however, of the most cautious and careful character. It was rather the removal of a prohibition than a direct permission. The Ashantee invasion was expected to take place, and the Governor was instructed to inflict such a severe punishment on the invaders as would remove the disastrous impression caused by their previous impunity, and the Duke of Newcastle went on to say—

tory, you are not to regard yourself as absolutely prohibited from doing so under any circumstances."

The idea of the Duke of Newcastle was this, and he was sure it would commend itself to the House—he thought Colonel Conran might find himself on the frontier of the protected States, and that the Ashantee army might be on the other bank of the river which divided the two parties, and that he might thus have an opportunity of striking a blow; while, if he had stringent orders absolutely forbidding him to cross the frontier, he might be obliged to forego that opportunity. It was to save the Governor and the officer commanding the troops from finding themselves in such a difficulty, his noble Friend gave that qualified permission. But that qualified permission never was acted on. The Colonel, hearing that a reinforcement of several companies of a West Indian Regiment was expected to arrive, thought it was not then advisable to cross the river. No enemy appeared in the shape of fighting men; but in the beginning of March the Colonel found a more formidable foe than the Ashantees. The rains set in most unexpectedly. [Ironic cries of "Hear, hear!"] Hon. Members appeared to be incredulous on that point, but he was positively informed, on the highest authority—on the authority of persons well acquainted with the Gold Coast, that the rains were not expected before the 1st of May, while it appeared from the despatches that they had come on so early as March. On the 11th of March the Governor wrote to say that the rains had already commenced; and a month after there was the correspondence between the Governor and the Commanding Officer, showing that serious sickness had set in amongst the force in camp, and that it was thought desirable to withdraw from the frontier to Cape Coast. That was done; but certainly there was reason to regret that it had not been done sooner, because the moment the rains began the sickness also commenced. It might be said that the expedition was a failure. It was a failure as regarded any victory in an engagement; but the reason was, that no enemy showed himself; but it was the means of protecting the territory for which we were responsible from any renewed devastation by the Ashantees. Those acquainted with the state of things on the Gold Coast were of opinion that the demonstration made by Colonel Conran had read a lesson to the Ashantees, which would deter them from a repetition of their former incursion. That was the end of the expedition; but the charge remained that the mortality occasioned by it, and by the arrival of the reinforcements, was excessive. It appeared, as his noble Friend the Under Secretary for War had shown, that there had been great exaggeration in the statements made on this head. No doubt there had been a deplorable loss of life. There often was a deplorable loss of life in African service, and he was inclined to think that the mortality was greater when the troops were doing nothing than when they were in action. He was sure that every hon. Member felt a deep regret at the loss of life which had resulted from this expedition, and especially for the loss sustained by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had brought forward the present Motion. Considering the affliction which the hon. and gallant Member had suffered, his speech was generally of a temperate and moderate character. But the House ought to understand that this loss of thirteen officers of the West Indian Regiment had not occurred in consequence of this expedition alone, but had been spread over a period of more than twelve months, and had occurred in two campaigns. In accounting for the mortality they must not forget how much was to be attributed to the ordinary nature of the climate of the Gold Coast, and that among the number who died were officers who had not been engaged in active service at all.

SIR JOHN HAY: I must correct the right hon. Gentleman. The mortality to which I referred did not extend over twelve months, because the Return is from the 1st of July.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said he did not understand the hon. and gallant Gentleman; certainly the time during which those deaths occurred was as much as twelve months, and there were two campaigns within that time.

SIR JOHN HAY: The Return is distinctly from the 1st of July, and does not include the first campaign.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he was entirely at issue with the hon. and gallant Gentleman on that point; but, at all events, one lesson which they had learnt from the expedition was this—that these West Indian troops as now recruited suffered from the climate of Africa as much as Europeans. Formerly those regiments were recruited from newly liberated slaves, but now they were made up in a great degree from negroes born in the West India Islands. He had further to observe that the idea of moving black troops into the interior of the country for the purpose of enforcing our authority was not a new one, for before now we had been obliged on several occasions to move our troops with that object, although so far was his noble Friend the Duke of Newcastle from looking upon such expeditions as desirable, that some years ago he addressed a despatch to all the Governors on the West Coast of Africa, desiring that they should never engage in any such movements without the permission of the Colonial Department; but the operations of last year were undertaken for the defence of territories for which we were responsible and which had been assailed. Under these circumstances, he submitted to the House that the permission of his noble Friend was given in consequence of an unprovoked incursion by the Ashantees on the Gold Coast, and that which he did was warranted by our obligations to the protected territories, and by previous practice. He believed his noble Friend was right when he said to the Governor of the Gold Coast, "You would do wrong to surrender those unhappy fugitives." He believed he was right when he sanctioned the first expedition; and he believed he was right when he gave that most cautious permission to the Governor for further proceedings; and he was still of opinion that the mortality was greatly exaggerated. The measure had been so far successful as a means of defence that it had prevented any repetition of the outrages of the Ashantees; and whatever might have been the mortality which unfortunately had resulted from the expedition, he submitted to the House that his noble Friend was only doing his duty when he gave permission to the Governor to defend those territories for which the British Government had deliberately rendered itself responsible.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I wish to say a few words before this debate closes, simply with the object of asking an explanation from Her Majesty's Government on two or three points which have been only very slightly adverted to this evening. I do not intend to say a word on the policy of the Ashantee war, if that can be called a war in which there was no fighting. I think the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies was a very natural one for him to make; and at this moment I am glad that we are spared the necessity of using any language which might appear to convey an attack on the policy of the Duke of Newcastle. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman is a most natural one, but its tendency has been to divert the attention of the House from the question really before us. The Motion of my hon. and gallant Friend does not, as I submit, raise any question as to the policy of the noble Duke. It raises this one question alone—when the Government decided, upon the representations of Governor Pine, to send troops to the Gold Coast, did they adopt such precautions for the safety of those troops as it was their bounden duty to take, considering the deadly climate of that country? At the beginning of last year, when these troubles commenced, we had a body of about 700 men at Cape Coast Castle. Subsequently reinforcements were sent out in two divisions—between 400 and 500 men in August, and a further force of nearly 700 men in April. The noble Marquess has told us that the 400 or 500 men landed from the Megara in August had nothing to do with these troubles; but surely on this point he must have spoken under some misapprehension. He would not of course wish to mislead the House, but I think I can recall to his memory facts that will bear out my statement. Twelve months ago the lamented brother of my hon. and gallant Friend was in England. Being a very able and distinguished officer, he was sent for on purpose to be despatched to the West Indies to aid in getting ready the troops who were to proceed to the coast of Africa. He went to the West Indies accordingly, and he accompanied to the coast of Africa the troops who were sent there, as I say, on account of the troubles. But, even supposing the noble Marquess to be right, he makes the case of the Government rather worse than it was before, because, if these troops were only sent to strengthen the force which it was thought politic to keep on the coast of Africa, the remissness of the Government in not providing for the health of the troops when they arrived there would have been greater than if they had been sent out on some sudden emergency. The question, therefore, is not whether the troops who had arrived in August were sent in consequence of the Ashantee war or not, but whether, when they arrived on the coast of Africa, they found proper precautions taken for their safety? Have the statements of the noble Marquess been satisfactory upon that point? Has he made any answer to the able and touching statement of my hon. and gallant Friend? The noble Marquess told us a great deal about a Major Clarke, an engineer officer, who was sent out to make the necessary arrangements; but with what appeared to be unfortunate candour he added, that Major Clarke had neither enough money nor enough material to permit of his doing anything when he arrived. One of the great dangers to which our troops were exposed on that coast is from the unwholesome water, there being no fresh water. The noble Marquess told us a distilling machine was sent out; but unfortunately it would not work when it arrived. [Mr. DENMAN: No!] The hon. and learned Member for Tiverton does not seem to like this statement.

MR. DENMAN: As I am personally alluded to perhaps I may be allowed to explain.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I am sure the hon. Gentleman will not deny what I say. It is a question of fact. I am informed—and I am sorry my hon. Friend is so much annoyed about the matter—I am informed that when the machinery arrived it would not work. If I am wrong, nothing can be easier than to expose the statement. Passing from this point, which seems to cause so much disturbance to hon. Gentlemen opposite, let me ask when this machine arrived out? Why, not till February—the first reinforcement of our troops, swelling the whole number to 1,200, having arrived in the previous August. During the interval our troops had to suffer the miseries and calamities caused not only by the destructive climate, but by the want of proper comforts. The painful and horrible results we all know; but as to the Return, I must really make some complaint of the carelessness with which it has been prepared. The number of the officers on one page does not correspond with that on the other. In the first page a list is given of the number of officers, and they amount to 64. We then find that no less than 35 are either dead or disabled by sickness; but in the next page the number given as effective is 48, which would raise the whole number of officers to 83 instead of 64. Which statement is right I do not know, but the discrepancies show a want of care. We have now heard the statements made on both sides. We have had the melancholy facts of the unparalleled number of men who have died or been disabled probably for life; and I will leave the House to judge whether the noble Marquess has at all got rid of the charge, not that this was an impolitic war—a point upon which I offer no opinion—but that, having commenced hostilities, the precautions necessary for the safety of our troops were not taken. I should like to have from the Secretary for the Colonies an explanation on another point. Four weeks ago, when I called attention to the Ashantee war, and to the dreadful havoc which was being made by the climate among our officers and men, I thought the answer of the right hon. Gentleman perfectly satisfactory, and accepted it as creditable to the Government. But I am sorry to say that, on the part of the Government, he made promises which have not been fulfilled. I am quite sure that nothing was further from his intention than to make any promise which he did not mean to perform; but this was what the right hon. Gentleman said—

“I may be fairly asked what is the course we intend to take in these circumstances? The last mail, as I have said, has only reached me within the last few days, but since its arrival I have been in communication with my noble Friend at the head of the War Department, and also with His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, as to what ought to be done in the present state of affairs; and now I have to inform the House that the determination at which we have arrived, and which I propose to announce to the authorities on the spot by the mail which leaves England on Monday next, is this—that transports shall be immediately dispatched to remove from the coast troops to the amount of those who have recently been sent there, so that the number may be reduced to that which can be accommodated with the means ordinarily available upon the Gold Coast, due regard being had to health and comfort.”

Here are two distinct pledges—one that transports should be immediately sent, and the other that the troops should be reduced to the number which could be accommodated with the means ordinarily available upon the Gold Coast. In one respect the right hon. Gentleman fully acted up to his undertaking. In a despatch dated May 23, four days after making the speech from which I have just quoted, the right hon. Gentleman wrote as follows:—

"It appears that the number of troops upon the coast will now be more than double the number for which the buildings will afford accommodation, and that the removal of a considerable number will be necessary for their own health and comfort, and for the health and comfort of those who are left behind. Immediate arrangements, therefore, are intended to be made by the War Department, for reducing the force at your disposal to its normal strength, and removing the remainder from the coast."

These unhappy men, then, were to be immediately removed at this critical time of year, the wet season, when they were dying from disease; and how do we find the pledge fulfilled? Why, last night we were told by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty that the orders to the Gladiator to proceed to the coast of Africa were never given till yesterday. There is very good reason to believe that those orders were not given yesterday until my hon. and gallant Friend had called at the Admiralty and had given notice of his question. When we asked what transport was to be sent, my noble Friend could not even tell us the name, but could only say that it was a sailing ship. Then I think I have a right to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, and to ask him whether he considers that after a month has elapsed it is a fair redemption of his promise to Parliament when we find that no vessel has yet been sent to fetch away these men, and that now a steam-vessel is to be sent, a vessel which, as my hon. and gallant Friend says, is not capable of conveying 550 men a distance of 2,000 miles. I think that is the worst part of the case. The pledge was given to the House deliberately, and, I have no doubt, in good faith, by the right hon. Gentleman, but it has not been fulfilled; and, therefore, I call upon the Government to give some explanation for such a deviation from the promise given to the House in language so distinct. Then, I will ask a second question—whether it is fair, after the language of the right hon. Gentleman, that only 500 men should be removed? The additional force sent to the coast of Africa was 1,100 men. The force there at the beginning of last year was 700 men. This inquiry is the more important after the statement of the noble Marquess—a statement which, in common with many other hon. Members, I heard with surprise and apprehension—that it is the intention of the Government permanently to increase our force upon the Gold Coast. I wish to hear a clear explanation of their intentions upon that point, as the words of the right hon. Gentleman were that the force was to be reduced to its normal strength. My construction of those words is that that force was to be maintained at the same strength as existed before these additional troops arrived. The reinforcements amounted to 1,100 men, and, excepting those unhappy men who are dead and gone, that number will have to be removed, if the pledge given by the right hon. Gentleman is fairly carried out. I will detain the House no longer. I wish to have an explanation on these points. I have heard as yet no language on the part of the Government which shows that any proper precautions were taken to fulfil the promises that were given, and, therefore, I feel bound to support the Motion.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Before I reply to the grave accusations which have been made against the Admiralty by the hon. and gallant Gentleman and by the right hon. Baronet, I wish to point out two errors—unintentional, I am sure—on the part of my hon. and gallant Friend. First, as to the number of men, my hon. and gallant Friend says that the Return bears upon its face proof of incorrectness, inasmuch as the number of officers in the first page does not correspond with the number in the second page. But I am informed by my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War, who has already spoken and cannot therefore answer by himself, that in the first page only the officers and men landed from the transports were mentioned. That, I am informed, is the cause of the apparent discrepancy; besides which officers have since been changed from other stations. The other misstatement is as to the number of deaths among the officers. My hon. and gallant Friend said that the Return did not include the deaths for the whole year, but I find that the first death mentioned in this Return is that of Ensign Bryan, who died on the 16th of May, 1863, so that it appears that the Return does include the deaths for the whole year. Now let me state to the House what has been the course of the Admiralty with respect to the removal of these troops. The first intimation which we received of the intended removal of troops was on Saturday, May 21. The War Office stated that all troops in excess of ordinary peace garrisons were to be removed. On Monday, May 23, the Director of Transports asked the Horse Guards for an approximate statement of the numbers to be removed. On the 26th of May—received on the 27th—the Horse Guards sent the number of troops, 19 officers and 448 men. Advertisements were issued on the 28th for a ship to convey those troops. Let me state that we pursued the usual course with regard to advertisements. We do not usually advertise for steamers, or we should enhance the cost per man. [Murmurs.] If hon. Gentlemen like to condemn the Admiralty after hearing my statement, they can do so, but pray listen to my explanations. We issued notice for tenders in the usual way. No steam vessel was tendered at first, but a sailing vessel. The best that was offered—the Wasbojeen of 1,400 tons—was taken up. Since then we have been continually pressing the owners to get her ready, and the brokers have informed us that every exertion has been used, and that men have been working on her night and day. I want to show that there has been no delay in hiring and fitting a vessel after my right hon. Friend had decided to remove the troops. Now I come to the question of what took place yesterday. My hon. and gallant Friend came to me at the Admiralty yesterday in a very excited state; I do not wonder at that, for he has sustained a very grievous loss of a near relative. He came to me and said that the matter was pressing, immense numbers were sick and dying, and that the vessel we were going to send would not be sufficient. He told me we should send a steamer. I am bound to say that statement did not tally with the accounts we have received, and my noble Friend the Under Secretary for War, has told the House that the real mortality in consequence of this war has not been greater than the normal mortality on that coast. He has given a Return which shows that at the latest date only 64 soldiers out of 1,300 were unable to do duty, and I will appeal to the House if that does show a very deplorable state of things? We took up the vessel I have mentioned, intending to send her in tow of a steamer until she fell in with the westerly winds which usually prevail outside the chops of the Channel. We had every reason to suppose that that vessel would arrive at Cape Coast Castle in about six weeks. But when my hon. and gallant Friend gave me yesterday that deplorable account it moved me very much, and I at once went to my colleagues, and not because of his notice of Motion but in consequence of his sad statement to me, we ordered that the

Gladiator should be prepared at once for sea, and she will sail to-morrow for Cape Coast Castle. The right hon. Baronet cannot be expected to know the carrying capacity of such a vessel; but it is unpardonable in my hon. and gallant Friend to make such a statement about the Gladiator as he has done. He said the Gladiator is a sickly ship. It is true that on one long antecedent occasion a good many men died on board of her in the West Indies. Does my hon. and gallant Friend wish the House to believe that we chose a ship that was remarkable for her sickly condition? Then we are told that the Gladiator was unfit to carry 500 men. Well, ships of her class have carried 600 or 700 at a time. ["Where?"] On many occasions, in the Black Sea, for instance. There is, I may add, a report of the captain of the Gladiator in which she is represented as being able to carry 400 soldiers for four or five days' voyage. [A laugh.] I wish hon. Gentlemen would be kind enough to hear me out. This is no laughing question. Her Majesty's Government are charged with having deliberately done an act of cruelty, and it is, I think, but right that I should be allowed to state frankly the whole case. The House will then be in a position to judge whether the Admiralty have or have not acted wrongly in this matter. The Gladiator, as I said before, is reported by her captain as being able to carry 400 troops for four days in all climates. [Sir JOHN HAY: On deck?] No, below. She is well calculated for a troopship, and we have supplied her with a double awning and all the preparations necessary to carry the required number of men in this instance. My gallant Friend says that Cape Coast Castle is very unhealthy, and that our troops die there by hundreds. Those who are well acquainted with it, however, represent it as comparatively one of the most healthy places on the coast. I have two despatches, one from Commodore Wilmot, in which 150 seamen and marines stationed there during the whole of the unhealthy season last year are reported as having enjoyed health. Commodore Lord John Hay, who visited the coast, says, in allusion to this unfortunate war—

"It was stated that much sickness had prevailed among the troops while away from Cape Coast Castle; but the patients seemed to have generally recovered quickly after their departure from the interior. I have been unable to ascertain that any serious amount of sickness need be apprehended as long as the men are actively employed."

All our officers, I may say, concur in the opinion, that if you keep the men employed and keep them away from the interior, comparatively little apprehension need be entertained for their health. I have been much pained to find that my hon. and gallant Friend has thought it his duty to make a statement which impugns the honour of one of our best officers—I allude to Captain Stirling, of the Tamar. He says he sailed away from Cape Coast Castle, refusing to assist in removing those poor dying men.

SIR JOHN HAY: I did not say he refused to do anything. On the contrary, I spoke of him in the highest terms. I blamed the Admiralty system which prevented orders from being given to Captain Stirling to meet the contingency.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I am glad to find that I have misunderstood my hon. and gallant Friend, and as to his remarks on the "Admiralty system" he is perfectly aware that officers in command can, and do take upon themselves the responsibilities of giving passages unless orders are given to the contrary. I can assure the House that, having looked over every despatch, we can find no mention made of anything of the sort. My hon. and gallant Friend has spoken of Cape Coast Castle as if it were some perfectly isolated part of the world, and seems to forget that a steamer goes backwards and forwards there every month. We have besides our own cruiser there, and are, in fact, in constant communication with the place; so that it is idle to tell me that officers who might be sick have no means of getting away from it. I think when we look into this matter and examine it carefully we shall find that the mortality is much exaggerated, and I may perhaps be allowed to refer to a statement made by the captain of Her Majesty's ship Ranger to show how uncertain is the coming of the rains. He made a Report to the Admiralty from Cape Coast on the 17th of May last year, in which he says, "The rains have not yet come, though they have been fifteen days expected." Now, we know that the rains this year began in March, almost unprecedentedly early, and this was undoubtedly a misfortune; but I cannot accept any blame upon the Admiralty. We have, I think, done all we could do under the circumstances of the case. We have at considerable inconvenience detached a ship from the Channel squadron knowing how very undesirable it

GENERAL PEEL: I will not detain the House more than a very few minutes. My object in rising is to endeavour to ascertain—information which I have in vain endeavoured to extract from the papers before us or from the speeches which have been made to-night—on whom the responsibility of these transactions rests. Is it to be the old story over again? Are these things to happen and nobody be responsible? I have heard the statement of the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War, and I am sorry to say that it by no means removed from my mind the impression made by the papers and the statements of the hon. and gallant Member, that there has been the greatest neglect somewhere, and that we have had in a minor degree a repetition of the blunders that took place in the Crimean war. Perhaps no Member of the House has spent so much time as I have in inquiring into that matter. I served as a Member of the Committee over which the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield so ably presided in connection with the Crimean war, and I was a member of that board of officers which afterwards sat at Chelsea, and heard everything so minutely described, that I think I could find my way almost blindfold about Balaklava; but the evidence in this instance is, in my opinion, quite as strong. On the face of the papers the management of this business has been quite disgraceful; for they show that the Government have learned nothing and forgotten nothing. What I want to know is, where the responsibility of the Colonial Office ends, and where that of the War Department begins? As to the policy of the war itself, that rests with the Government. I do not believe that the Secretary of State for the Colonies would undertake to involve his country in a contest like this without having previously obtained the sanction of his colleagues. But having obtained their sanction, the next step is to communicate to the Secretary of War that such a war was to be undertaken; and from that moment I should say that the Secretary of State for War is responsible. I cannot ascertain at what time the Secretary of State for the Colonies communicated that the troops were required. The Secretary of State for War denies that they were sent for warlike purposes, and yet the Secretary of State for the Colonies draws the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the despatch in which the "enemy" is mentioned. Good God, what is the meaning of the word "enemy" in that despatch. And yet the Secretary of State for War denies that the troops were sent for war. Now, I solemnly declare that no Governor Pine, no Secretary of State for the Colonies, would ever induce me to land troops on that coast at the very moment of the rainy season. It is very well to say that the rainy season does not usually commence so early. Governor Pine wrote to you, saying that "there are intimations that the rainy season is coming on earlier than usual." If my hon. and gallant Friend had moved for a Committee of Inquiry sure I am that not one could refuse it. My only difficulty is to say who is to blame. Had I been asked what should be done, I should have said, move for every paper, correspondence, and minute between the War Office, the Colonial Office, the Admiralty, and the Horse Guards, and see when requisitions were made for troops, and when they were ordered to go out. The noble Lord the Under Secretary says there was an excellent commissariat officer, but that officer is not to be expected to make bread out of stones. Give us a list of the transports that were sent there; how many of the 50,000 Natives were fed at our expense. We want to know more than the papers tell us. Then the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty says, as an excuse for not having sent out the Gladiator sooner, that it was only yesterday that my hon. and gallant Friend called on him with a most deplorable story; but the most deplorable part of the story is, that the Admiralty appear to have been obliged to rely on the information of an individual as to what had taken place. Surely that is not the proper way of conducting the business of the Admiralty or of the Government. But we are told this proceeding has had a very great effect—the Colonial Secretary says that the troops landing there had a very good effect. Well, but unfortunately that was said before. Governor Pine was told in case the invasion took place, to inflict a blow which would remove the disastrous impression caused by previous impunity. But what will be thought now, when our force was obliged to withdraw without inflicting a blow? My belief is it will tend rather to increase the confidence of the King of Ashantee, and thus free from his terror the

MR. CARDWELL: I rise to answer the two questions put to me by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), whose view of the policy of these transactions differs so widely from that of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down. The right hon. Baronet entirely approves the despatch which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman says is calculated to give so much confidence to the King of Ashantee. The right hon. Baronet says that the statement I made on a former occasion in answer to his question was perfectly satisfactory, provided it was carried into effect, and then he asked me how the pledge given had been performed by the Government. He approved the despatch, but then he asked how that despatch tallied with the course of the Secretary of State for War? That despatch was written, as it purports, in concert with my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War, and the answer which my noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty has given to the House shows that on the following day a letter written by my noble Friend carried into effect, and into full and complete effect, the statement I made in this despatch. The right hon. Baronet asks me what is meant by the normal state of the force on the Gold Coast. Now the normal state of the force on the West Coast is two battalions. Of these two battalions, one is divided between Lagos and the Gold Coast. These details are not within my immediate cognizance, but I am informed when the men sent for by the Admiralty are carried to the West Indies, and when the detachment sent to Lagos are withdrawn, the number left will be under 600 men, corresponding precisely with the answer I gave. I think I have completely answered the two questions put to me by the right hon. Baronet. Now, in answer to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down, and who says that these papers show very great neglect on the part of the Government, let me be permitted to ask him whether he has seen that the commanding officer, up to the latest moment, speaks in language entirely at variance with that which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman has just addressed to the House. So late as the 12th of February he speaks of "the whole force being safely encamped on the banks of the river Prah in excellent spirits and in a satisfactory condition." So late as the 11th of March he speaks of "the officers and men being in good spirits and fair health," and in the very last account I have from him he says, after the rainy season had began—

"He regrets not being able to carry out our original intention of invading the Ashantee country, for which I was in every other respect well prepared, having at these camps seventy days' meat for 1,200 men, and forty-two days' biscuit in store for a similar number."

Here is the Commander-in-Chief of the forces saying he was in every respect well prepared. That is the answer in these papers to the statement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. I have had the opportunity also of speaking to the Colonial Secretary, who has recently come home. He was a member of the Executive Council, and his words are these—

"Whether the declaration of a war with the King of Ashantee was right or wrong is a question of local policy; but that the Home Government has failed in making provision for preserving the health of the troops is an assertion which I deny."

He says—

"The Tamar transport anchored at Cape Coast on the 8th or 9th of April, but tents were ready for the accommodation of the troops. The troops did not suffer in the least by being placed under canvas, for by the 14th of April Colonel Conran had got nearly every one of the men into houses."

And with regard to the scarcity of food, he says—

"With the food and the mode of hutting at the Prah no fault can be reasonably found. Assistant Commissary Blanc, the commissariat officer in charge at Cape Coast, had made such excellent arrangements, that long prior to the month of April the rations at the Prah amounted to a supply of fifty or sixty days for 1,200 men, the whole available force."

"Mr. Blanc, told me that the preserved meat brought so abundantly from England for the troops was the best that he had ever seen. Staff Assistant Surgeon Hammond spoke also in the same laudatory strain. He informed me that he did not recollect to have witnessed so much care and forethought displayed in the packing and selection of medicines, as was displayed in the packing and selection of the medicines transmitted from his department."

most able in the service, and by the authority of the Staff Assistant Surgeon, what was the case with reference to the provisions, with reference to the medical supplies, and with regard to the position of the troops at the very latest accounts. I think, therefore, I have answered the questions put to me with reference to the promise I gave; and the statement I have made is my answer to the remarks of the right hon. and gallant General.

Mr. CORRY said, it was impossible to have heard the statement of his hon. and gallant Friend without being deeply impressed; more especially when they remembered under what circumstances of domestic bereavement it was made; and if the gallant brother he had lost had the same ability, energy of character, and worth as his hon. and gallant Friend, the country had indeed sustained a severe loss. He (Mr. Corry) did not intend to enter on the general question under discussion, but he wished to make a few remarks in consequence of what fell from the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, who he did not think had improved the case as it stood against the Government. His speech afforded an admirable illustration of the Circumlocution system. Communications were made by the Admiralty, first to one office, and then to another; and, at last, tenders were called for, but not for steam-transport, because the price was so high per man. The noble Lord talked of the price per man when the troops were dying like flies on that pestilential coast. At last a sailing transport with an unpronounceable name was taken up, and at the end of a month she was not ready for sea. His hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth told him that when he commanded an East Indiaman he had sailed from the Channel to the equator in sixteen days, and therefore had this vessel been despatched at once she might at that moment have been embarking our soldiers. He contended that the Admiralty, as soon as this cry of distress reached them from the coast of Africa, ought not to have issued advertisements for sailing vessels, but they ought to have communicated with the directors of the great steam companies, and, no matter at what cost per man, have taken up one of the most powerful, capacious, and rapid steam vessels that could be obtained. And supposing that the mercantile marine could not have furnished such a vessel, had they not their steam reserve, including magnificent first-class frigates of 3,000 tons burden and 800-horse power, and several line-of-battle ships of great size and speed and good ventilation, which were admirably adapted to such a service? In the coast-guard service there were already in commission three vessels—the Trafalgar and two others of the same class—any one of which might have been sent to sea in a week. As it was, they were now, at the end of a month, told that a transport was to sail on the following day or the day after. He could confirm all that his hon. and gallant Friend had said about the Gladiator. He was a Lord of the Admiralty at the time she was built, and knew her well. A vessel less adapted to the service could not have been found if the Admiralty had exercised their ingenuity to discover the worst possible ship. Although nominally a ship of 1,200 tons, deducting the space occupied by her machinery, she was really of only 800 tons burden, and had neither speed nor the capacity for the service for which she had been selected.

MR. DENMAN (who was received with cries of "Divide") said, he claimed in justice to be heard, because the right hon. Baronet who addressed the House a few minutes ago pointedly alluded to him. The right hon. Baronet challenged him to make good his words, because he chose to take notice of the dissent which he uttered, perhaps somewhat loudly, but he believed not indecorously. When he expressed his dissent the right hon. Baronet was misrepresenting, of course unintentionally, what had been stated by the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War. The right hon. Baronet represented the noble Lord as saying that the attempt to supply the troops with water had utterly failed. What the noble Lord really did say was, that the moment the Government was aware that there was a lack of water, which they had not had reason to anticipate, they sent out a condensing apparatus, guaranteed to supply 1,200 gallons a day, and which actually supplied 500 gallons per day. The real question was, Whether the Government, when they knew there was a lack of water, did that which became them as prudent men to supply the need? He would not further trouble the House.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE observed, that the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty had told them that the Gladiator had that afternoon been ordered to proceed upon the service; and he further stated that a ship in the West Indies had been ordered to hold herself in readiness to proceed to the Cape de Verd Islands. Then he (Sir J. Elphinstone) asked him whether the Gladiator was to act as a go-between in reference to these two points, and how many trips she would require to make to carry these troops from the coast of Africa to the Cape de Verd Islands? He had in view that the Cape de Verd Islands were exceedingly unhealthy, and had an exceedingly stringent quarantine law; and also the size and description of the Gladiator. Now, the Gladiator was a ship of not more than 800 tons, and when she had provided for her own men she was incapable of carrying more than 250 men with any degree of comfort. He listened with great pleasure to the statement which was made by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay). The only part of that statement which he regretted was that containing the two sentences at the conclusion of his speech. Standing in the relation which he did to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, he hoped that he would pardon him if he offered an apology on his part for having left the subject in hand and entered upon others which were not before the House. The noble Lord the Under Secretary for War was put up to defend the Government, and he made a speech which showed the greatest possible ignorance of the state of matters in a tropical climate. He told the House of the dietary provided for these troops, of the beef and mutton they were to have. He totally forgot that the greater portion of these troops were engaged at a distance from the coast, and that neither cattle nor sheep could travel in that country, and that meat could not be kept fresh for more than two days at the utmost. They were told that the troops received the greatest attention and had no wants whatever; but though strong men might in such a climate stand salt meat and biscuit for forty days, yet to men upon the sick list it was death. The Return on the table seemed to relate to the troops within sight only, but took no account of those in the interior. They also sought for quarters for the troops at a place where all the buildings had been twelve months before destroyed by an earthquake. It also seemed that unless the men died upon the very line of march they were not supposed to die in connection with the expedition; and the gallant officer who had been re-

encamped on the banks of the river Prah in excellent spirits and in a satisfactory condition." So late as the 11th of March he speaks of "the officers and men being in good spirits and fair health," and in the very last account I have from him he says, after the rainy season had begun—

"He regrets not being able to carry out our original intention of invading the Ashantee country, for which I was in every other respect well prepared, having at these camps seventy days' meat for 1,200 men, and forty-two days' biscuit in store for a similar number."

Here is the Commander-in-Chief of the forces saying he was in every respect well prepared. That is the answer in these papers to the statement of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. I have had the opportunity also of speaking to the Colonial Secretary, who has recently come home. He was a member of the Executive Council, and his words are these—

"Whether the declaration of a war with the King of Ashantee was right or wrong is a question of local policy; but that the Home Government has failed in making provision for preserving the health of the troops is an assertion which I deny."

He says—

"The Tamar transport anchored at Cape Coast on the 8th or 9th of April, but tents were ready for the accommodation of the troops. The troops did not suffer in the least by being placed under canvas, for by the 14th of April Colonel Conran had got nearly every one of the men into houses."

And with regard to the scarcity of food, he says—

"With the food and the mode of hutting at the Prah no fault can be reasonably found. Assistant Commissary Blanc, the commissariat officer in charge at Cape Coast, had made such excellent arrangements, that long prior to the month of April the rations at the Prah amounted to a supply of fifty or sixty days for 1,200 men, the whole available force."

Then, with regard to transport, he speaks of 1,000 carriers receiving daily wages. He says, the Commissariat Officer,

"Mr. Blanc, told me that the preserved meat brought so abundantly from England for the troops was the best that he had ever seen. Staff Assistant Surgeon Hammond spoke also in the same laudatory strain. He informed me that he did not recollect to have witnessed so much care and forethought displayed in the packing and selection of medicines, as was displayed in the packing and selection of the medicines transmitted from his department."

most able in the service, and by the authority of the Staff Assistant Surgeon, what was the case with reference to the provisions, with reference to the medical supplies, and with regard to the position of the troops at the very latest accounts. I think, therefore, I have answered the questions put to me with reference to the promise I gave; and the statement I have made is my answer to the remarks of the right hon. and gallant General.

Mr. CORRY said, it was impossible to have heard the statement of his hon. and gallant Friend without being deeply impressed; more especially when they remembered under what circumstances of domestic bereavement it was made; and if the gallant brother he had lost had the same ability, energy of character, and worth as his hon. and gallant Friend, the country had indeed sustained a severe loss. He (Mr. Corry) did not intend to enter on the general question under discussion, but he wished to make a few remarks in consequence of what fell from the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, who he did not think had improved the case as it stood against the Government. His speech afforded an admirable illustration of the Circumlocution system. Communications were made by the Admiralty, first to one office, and then to another; and, at last, tenders were called for, but not for steam-transports, because the price was so high per man. The noble Lord talked of the price per man when the troops were dying like flies on that pestilential coast. At last a sailing transport with an unpronounceable name was taken up, and at the end of a month she was not ready for sea. His hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth told him that when he commanded an East Indiaman he had sailed from the Channel to the equator in sixteen days, and therefore had this vessel been despatched at once she might at that moment have been embarking our soldiers. He contended that the Admiralty, as soon as this cry of distress reached them from the coast of Africa, ought not to have issued advertisements for sailing vessels, but they ought to have communicated with the directors of the great steam companies, and, no matter at what cost per man, have taken up one of the most powerful, capacious, and rapid steam vessels that could be obtained. And supposing that the mercantile marine could not have furnished such a vessel, had they not their steam reserve, including magnificent first-class frigates of 3,000 tons burden and 800-horse power, and several line-of-battle ships of great size and speed and good ventilation, which were admirably adapted to such a service? In the coast-guard service there were already in commission three vessels—the Trafalgar and two others of the same class—any one of which might have been sent to sea in a week. As it was, they were now, at the end of a month, told that a transport was to sail on the following day or the day after. He could confirm all that his hon. and gallant Friend had said about the Gladiator. He was a Lord of the Admiralty at the time she was built, and knew her well. A vessel less adapted to the service could not have been found if the Admiralty had exercised their ingenuity to discover the worst possible ship. Although nominally a ship of 1,200 tons, deducting the space occupied by her machinery, she was really of only 800 tons burden, and had neither speed nor the capacity for the service for which she had been selected.

MR. DENMAN (who was received with cries of "Divide") said, he claimed in justice to be heard, because the right hon. Baronet who addressed the House a few minutes ago pointedly alluded to him. The right hon. Baronet challenged him to make good his words, because he chose to take notice of the dissent which he uttered, perhaps somewhat loudly, but he believed not indecorously. When he expressed his dissent the right hon. Baronet was misrepresenting, of course unintentionally, what had been stated by the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War. The right hon. Baronet represented the noble Lord as saying that the attempt to supply the troops with water had utterly failed. What the noble Lord really did say was, that the moment the Government was aware that there was a lack of water, which they had not had reason to anticipate, they sent out a condensing apparatus, guaranteed to supply 1,200 gallons a day, and which actually supplied 500 gallons per day. The real question was, Whether the Government, when they knew there was a lack of water, did that which became them as prudent men to supply the need? He would not further trouble the House.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE observed, that the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty had told them that the Gladiator had that afternoon been ordered to proceed

The only part of that statement which he regretted was that containing the two sentences at the conclusion of his speech. Standing in the relation which he did to the hon. and gallant Gentleman, he hoped that he would pardon him if he offered an apology on his part for having left the subject in hand and entered upon others which were not before the House. The noble Lord the Under Secretary for War was put up to defend the Government, and he made a speech which showed the greatest possible ignorance of the state of matters in a tropical climate. He told the House of the dietary provided for these troops, of the beef and mutton they were to have. He totally forgot that the greater portion of these troops were engaged at a distance from the coast, and that neither cattle nor sheep could travel in that country, and that meat could not be kept fresh for more than two days at the utmost. They also sought for quarters for the troops at a place where all the buildings had been twelve months before destroyed by an earthquake. It also seemed that unless the men died upon the very line of march they were not supposed to die in connection with the expedition; and the gallant officer who had been referred to was actually operating on one of the flanks of the army and yet the noble Lord denied that he had anything to do with the expedition. The Government were now on their trial with regard to the occupation of that pestilential coast at all; and unless they could satisfactorily defend that occupation and justify their relations towards the savage tribes whom they protected, he, for one, must vote for the Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: We have heard it, Sir, in the course of this debate, more than once stated that this is not a party question. I should like to know what name you are to give to a Motion which casts censure upon the Government. The word "censure" has, indeed, been withdrawn from the Resolution, but the censure itself has not been withdrawn from its spirit and substance. The Resolution is no doubt a Vote of Censure on the Government generally. The right hon. and gallant Officer who spoke on the other side said he was anxious to censure, but complained that he did not know whom to censure. He told us he wanted to know on whom he could justly throw the blame which he thought belonged to somebody. I contend humbly that the statements which have been made by my noble and right hon. Friends in the course of this debate show that, at all events, the assertion contained in the Resolution—namely, that the Government have not adequately provided for the comfort and health of the troops landed for the purpose of carrying on war against the King of Ashantee—has been completely and conclusively disproved. Why, Sir, it has been over and over again proved by documents, that every precaution was taken to provide the troops with shelter when they arrived; that they did obtain that shelter, notwithstanding a calamitous accident, which deprived them of the use of those buildings on which they might have reckoned; and that in the course of a few days after they landed they were all placed where they could find protection against the inclemency of the weather. It has been shown by my right hon. Friend, from authentic documents, that the supplies of food of all kinds were ample, whether of meats, of biscuits, or of flour. It has been shown that the medical arrangements were as good as it was possible to make them. It has been shown that every effort was made to procure for the troops a supply of distilled water. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich forgot that it had been stated by my noble Friend that the distilling apparatus, instead of supplying a very large quantity of water, supplied 500 gallons a day; and then the right hon. Baronet gets up and says that the apparatus broke down, and was of no use whatever. That is a specimen of the broad and groundless assertions which have been made on the other side. It is very easy to conduct a debate when you reiterate statements which are disproved by every Member who speaks against you, and when you say you have made out your case, although, in fact, your case has utterly broken down.

Well, the Resolution calls upon the House to say it laments the want of foresight on the part of the Government. Sir, we are ready to join in affirming that we lament the loss of life which has unfortunately occurred in these operations, and if that had been the Resolution moved—if the hon. and gallant Officer had moved a Resolution stating that this House lamented the loss of life which was occasioned, not by a war against the King of Ashantee, because no such war actually took place, but by preparations to resist such a war, and had followed that up by the expression of a hope that in future matters might be so arranged with the King of Ashantee as to prevent the recurrence of such circumstances, we might have accepted it. However, that would not have suited the taste of hon. Gentlemen opposite. But I say we cannot agree, and I trust the House will not agree, to this Resolution, founded as it is on untruth, and on assertions which have been refuted, and imputing blame which we have shown that we have not deserved. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich has well said that the Motion before the House does not involve the question of the policy of a war with the King of Ashantee. It was very wise of him to say so. Why, how did this war originate, if indeed war there has been? It originated in the duty devolving on the British Government to defend the protected tribes in that region. Who was it who first established that protectorate on behalf of those tribes? Was it those who sit on these (the Treasury) Benches? It was the Government of the Earl of Derby. That principle was followed up by all successive Governments, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich is himself one of those who sanctioned and acted upon it. Well, but if England formally takes under its protection tribes of men, and if those tribes are attacked by a foreign enemy, I say the honour of the country may require, and ought to require, some step to be adopted to make that protection not an empty word but a reality in favour of those to whom it is extended. Does any man say that the Governor of Cape Coast Castle ought to have given up the two negroes who fled to our protection? I am sure there is not a man in this House who would contend that the Governor would have been justified in delivering up these fugitives to certain death. Well, the refusal to do that was the cause of the attack made on the protected tribes by the King of Ashantee; and that attack led very naturally and necessarily to some counter demonstration in their favour. But it is said that we ought to have foreseen that the rainy season would commence two months earlier than usual; that a convulsion would destroy the port of Accra; and, in short, that we should have foreknown things which we could not possibly have foreknown, but which, when they did happen, were so guarded against by the precautions taken, that, as I maintain, the statements which have been made of the loss sustained by the troops in this service are greatly exaggerated. That has been proved by my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War, and the Returns also showed it to be so. Great art has been employed in mixing up casualties wholly unconnected with these operations and in ascribing them all to a service to which they did not properly belong. I say, therefore, that hon. Gentlemen opposite are wise in having abstained from that which would perhaps have been a more candid Motion—namely, a condemnation of the policy of protecting these tribes and making war in their defence; because that policy was theirs, and though we afterwards adopted it, not ours. They feel themselves precluded, therefore, from condemning that which was the real cause of this expedition into the interior being undertaken, and which has resulted in the losses which we deplore. I say, then, that I trust to the justice of this House, and I hope it will not be carried away by the unsupported assertions that have been made. As to want of foresight and want of proper precaution, we have been told, and it has been proved, that every precaution was taken. The loss also was greatly exaggerated, and does not in reality amount to more than might have been expected under ordinary circumstances in a tropical climate. The right hon. Baronet said he had been a Member of the Committee with reference to the Crimean war, and that this expedition reminded him ["No, no!"]—I beg pardon, it was the right hon. and gallant Officer beside him. Such a statement might have been pardonable in the right hon. Baronet, because he is only a yeoman, but I think it was hardly fair on the part of a Gentleman who ought to be better informed as to the nature of military arrangements, and better able to compare assertions with details that entirely contradict them. I say this is undoubtedly a censure upon the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, who is now like a greyhound in the leash, always likes to have the last word. I see him now anxious to start upon his legs. But I trust that the House will take a more serious view of this matter. No doubt the question is one involving considerations of the most serious character. The position is one of embarrassment for any Government. When they find that by a long course of policy the country is embarked in a particular course, and when they find that course cannot be adequately followed up without entailing a great sacrifice of life, the position must be a very painful one. All that any Government can be required to do under such circumstances is to act according to the best of their judgment in following out the line of policy to which in some degree the honour and character of the country is pledged, and to take every means which may render the enforcement of its obligations attended with as little as possible of unnecessary sacrifice of life. It was thought the best troops to employ on this service were those troops of colour whom we had in our West India regiments. Unfortunately it has turned out that those born in the West Indies have lost that immunity from the effects of African climate which their ancestors enjoyed, and they suffered almost as much as Europeans could do under similar circumstances. It was a duty incumbent upon the Government, a duty which, I contend, has been performed, to take every precaution, medically or through the commissariat, which could prevent the troops sent upon this enterprise from feeling unduly the effects of the tropical climate. The Government felt this duty more peculiarly incumbent upon them, because though it was imagined their colour might protect the troops, the officers, being Europeans, could not be expected to enjoy equal immunity. I contend that any one who will read these papers, any one who has listened to this debate, will see, and if he is candid and impartial will acknowledge, that there was nothing the Government could have done that they did not do. [Cries of "Oh! oh!" from the Opposition Benches.]

Oh, I do not expect hon. Gentlemen opposite to agree with me. I am not addressing myself to those who came to this debate with foregone conclusions, prepared to vote censure whether it be deserved or not. I appeal to the body of the House. And I say they ought to make allowance for the position of a Government which, having to pursue a line of policy traced out for a long course of time by those who went before, and finding that policy imposed a duty which could not be performed without incurring sacrifice of life, still felt that the honour of the country demanded an effort, that duty called on them to make that effort, an effort which having now been made has not proved so fatal to those employed in carrying it into execution as some have represented and others have feared. I will only add that I trust this House will act according to its deliberate judgment. In that event I am confident it will not agree to the Vote of Censure which the hon. and gallant Officer proposes, but will, on the contrary, go with the Government into Committee of Supply, setting aside the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I cannot refuse the challenge of the noble Lord, although, so far as I am concerned, I should be glad if the debate were now to close. I am glad that the noble Lord in the latter part of his speech addressed the House in a tone of gravity which somewhat became the subject. For my part, I prefer the tone of the noble Lord when he gives us the advantage of his long experience, and speaks without that affectation of unnecessary levity, which he, the leading statesman of the greatest Empire in the world, seems to think is indispensable as a compliment, I suppose, to the House of Commons to introduce into every debate. The noble Lord says it is very easy to make loud and unfounded assertions. I quite agree with the noble Lord. I have listened to him often, and admired the manner—in speaking of any one else I should say the happy effrontery—with which he makes his unfounded assertions. But I think to-night the noble Lord has exceeded himself, and I shall show to the House has far excelled any achievement of that class which has before illustrated his name. The noble Lord dwelt for some time, for some quarter of an hour, on a subject which need not have engaged our attention this evening, and that was the policy of war with Ashantee. The noble Lord was not content to leave his opponents untouched, his vindication of the conduct of his own Government being that they followed the policy which had been traced out and established by the Government of the Earl of Derby. Now I must say, that having been an humble Member of that Government, I am perfectly unaware—

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: If I said the Government of the Earl of Derby, I made a slip of the tongue. I ought to have said the Government in which that noble Lord was Secretary for the Colonies.

MR. DISRAELI: The noble Lord has now made another slip of the tongue. His first statement was, that it was the Government of the Earl of Derby. He now recalls that statement, although he charged my right hon. Friends, and particularly the hon. Member for Droitwich, with being the Secretary of State who carried that policy into execution. But this master of bold and unfounded assertions, when I ventured to correct one misstatement, takes up another position. He now says it was not the Government of the Earl of Derby, but another Government, in which the Earl of Derby was Secretary of State for the Colonies—I presume he means the Government of Sir Robert Peel in 1841. But, unless I am entirely misinformed—unless what I have read on the subject entirely deceives me, the protectorate of the Fantec tribes and of all those tribes which have engaged our attention to-night, leading to the permanence of our occupation of Cape Coast Castle, was established in the year 1826, at the conclusion of the war in that country. Therefore, I say, when a person, and a person of the great eminence and position of the noble Lord, after a debate of much interest on a subject unquestionably of very great national importance, rises in his place and scolds and flounces about the evening having been taken up with bold and unfounded assertions which are easy to make, and, when refuted, to repeat, and in answering those to whom he is replying, himself comes forward with a statement so entirely unfounded upon a subject happening within his own official experience, not only as a Member of this House, but as a Minister of the Crown, I must say I think the noble Lord under the circumstances should look a little at home before addressing the House with the confidence he has evinced this evening. The noble Lord, with that command of Parliamentary language which distinguishes him, says that the Resolution which has been tendered for the consideration of the House is false—that it is founded in untruth. Well, that is strong language. The noble Lord may not clearly remember the language of this Resolution, which he says is founded in untruth. The Resolution asserts two things. It first declares that no sufficient provision was made for preserving the health of the troops employed in this particular service. Now, is it the opinion of the House that sufficient provision was made? No one can for a moment pretend that question is open to a doubt. Why, have we not been told that if we had only asked for a Committee of Inquiry into the subject, and had not introduced a censure on the Government, the facts themselves are so generally known, the statement is so accurate and undeniable, that it would have been impossible for any one to resist it? What is the next statement in the Resolution? Why, that there was a want of foresight, which has caused this large loss of life. The noble Lord says sufficient provision was made, and that there was no want of foresight. Sufficient provision was made to produce the disaster. If that was your foresight, if your prophetic vision foresaw the calamities which have occurred, we may grant you that virtue of sagacity which some are disposed to say you do not possess. On the other hand, if you wish to prove that sufficient provision was made by the wretched state in which the troops found themselves, we may form an opinion of what is your definition of a proper equipment for a warlike force on the Gold Coast. It appears to me that the somewhat blustering statements of the noble Lord can only end in the refutation of the very position which he had endeavoured to assume. The House has been told two or three times to-night that this is not a party question, and the noble Lord has taunted us as if that statement had been made particularly from this side. I own that I have not heard it from this side of the House. Indeed, I do not recollect having heard it at all except from the hon. and learned Colleague of the noble Lord in the representation of Tiverton (Mr. Denman), who a few minutes ago addressed to us that peculiar speech which I confess I did not understand. But I contend that if great disasters occur in the conduct of a military expedition, it is the duty of an Opposition to call attention to them, to inquire into their cause, and to ask who is responsible for results which fill the country with mourning. We should be ashamed of ourselves if such incidents could pass unnoticed; but if the noble Lord means to say that there has been any concerted scheme to use this particular case in order to give a trial of strength, he speaks with very inaccurate information on the subject. Nothing was more natural than that the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield should call attention to this lamentable affair. He drew his Resolution himself, and the only reason why that word which the noble Lord has taunted this side of the House for omitting was left out when the question was put from the Chair was, because I understand the hon. and gallant Gentleman was told by some friend that it was not a Parliamentary phrase. Surely, it is expedient that in asking the opinion of the House upon any question we should always, as far as possible, follow those precedents of language, by acting upon which we generally manage to conduct our affairs without any unnecessary acerbity of expression. But the hon. and gallant Member never for a moment meant to conceal that the object of his Resolution was to pass a censure upon the Administration that is either guilty or not guilty of being responsible for the calamities which have occurred, and which, I submit, the House could not pass over without notice. The mode in which our opinion has been asked is one perfectly Parliamentary and constitutional. No art has been used in making the statements which have been advanced to-night; no answer has been given to those statements, and I maintain that the tone of the Prime Minister himself has been quite unworthy of the very grave subject which has engaged our attention.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: What I meant to say was that in 1842, when Lord Stanley was Secretary for the Colonies and Sir Robert Peel was Prime Minister, the protectorate of the African tribes was resumed. It was commenced long before, but had been given up for a short time.

MR. DISRAELI: The noble Lord omits to state that it was resumed on a Report of the House of Commons recommending its assumption.

Resolutions reported.

LORD NAAS said, he wished to refer to a matter which occupied considerable attention in Ireland, and which had reference to the office of Public Works in that country. He had been unwilling to call attention to this subject, lest he should shake confidence in the administration of the Board, but a debate had recently taken place on the subject, and the Government had introduced a Bill, altering the constitution of the Board. The late Chairman had retired to a comparatively subordinate position. He therefore thought it was worthy of the consideration of the Government whether the Board should not be placed upon a different footing, and in immediate connection with the Irish Government. Great inconvenience had constantly arisen from the position of the Board. Serious exceptions had been taken to acts committed by the Board, and it had been always a matter of difficulty to find out who was really responsible for those acts. He wished to ask whether in the new arrangement it was intended to place the Board more in connection with the Irish Government? The large expenditure which the Board had been in the habit of making was coming rapidly to an end, and it therefore ceased to be the important department it was heretofore. There was another body in connection with it—namely, the Fishery Commission, which occasioned great inconvenience, inasmuch as the public could not exercise any control over the acts of that Commission. He hoped that the permanent part—the Inspectors and Commissioners—would be wholly removed from the superintendence of the Board of Works, and that they would be placed in connection with the Irish Government. If the Board of Works were to be continued he thought it should have a member of the Government attached to it. It was worth the attention of the Government, whether they could devise some means by which a responsible member of the Government should be connected with it, and the Fishery Commission removed from that department.

MR. PEEL said, that with all respect for the opinion of the noble Lord he could not agree with him in thinking that there was any ground for being dissatisfied with the constitution of the Board of Works. The Board had hitherto consisted of three persons, but as long ago as 1854 the Treasury contemplated that the number of Commissioners should be reduced from three to two, and one of the present Commissioners was at first only appointed temporarily. He brought in a Bill to reduce the number, but it occurred to him afterwards that a better present arrangement would be that Sir R. Griffith should accept an honorary Commissionership, and thus the Board still nominally consist of three Commissioners, and he therefore withdrew the Bill. With regard to the relations of the Irish Board of Works with the Treasury, he considered these relations satisfactory, and that the Treasury should communicate with them direct and not through the medium of the Irish Government. With regard to the Fisheries Commission, the failure in the result of its duties should not be ascribed to any unwillingness of its members to execute the law, but to the imperfection of the law which required a private person to take preliminary proceedings before it could be put in motion. By the act of last Session, however, the new Fisheries Commissioners could themselves, and without the intervention of any private person, initiate proceedings.

MR. BUTT expressed his concurrence with the views of the noble Lord, and thought it would be desirable that the Board of Works in Ireland should be represented by a Minister in that House. The Chairman of the Board was totally removed from the control of Parliament.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it would be exceedingly improper for the House to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member. Very large financial interests were intrusted to the administration of the Irish Board of Works, and it would be inconvenient to have two representatives of the finance of the country in that House. He, therefore, thought it right that the Irish Board of Works should be represented in the House of Commons through the medium of the Treasury.

LORD FERMOY said, he hoped some change would take place in the constitution of the Irish Board. The Secretary for Ireland ought to represent the Board in that House if the Chancellor of the Exchequer represented the financial department.

COMPANY OF AFRICAN TRADERS.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it be the intention of the Government to grant a Subsidy of £5,000 per annum, or any other sum, to the "Company of African Traders (Limited);" if so, upon what conditions the Subsidy will be granted, and whether it will previously be submitted to Parliament for approval?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that last year an application was made to the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in favour of a subsidy which the noble Lord at first was disposed to decline; but upon subsequent consideration he brought the matter before the Treasury with a recommendation in favour of it. Other papers had reached the Treasury which showed that the Company it was proposed to subsidize was a Company engaged in general trade in competition with all those carrying on commerce between this country and Africa. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had no doubt that this demand ought not to be granted without a great deal of consideration on the part of the House, and ample time being given for all those affected by it to be heard. He had no difficulty in saying that he should make no such proposal during the present Session. He thought, however, it would be advantageous if the Government laid on the table the papers received. That would give hon. Gentlemen an opportunity of seeing the case, but for his own part he thought the objections to the proposal were objections of very great weight.

SLAVE TRADE.

THE "CASTILLA," "LOLA," & "LAURA."

QUESTION.

MR. CAVE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Why the brig Castilla and brigantine Lola, captured under Spanish colours in October, 1860, by Her Majesty's ship Barraqueta, on suspicion of slave trading, were carried into Port Royal, Jamaica, instead of being taken before the Mixed Commission Court at Havanna; whose fault was it that those years

sels remained in Port Royal Harbour, untried, till May, 1861, by which demurrage was incurred to the amount of £10 a day for 229 days in one case, and £11 for 230 days in the other, besides other expenses, amounting in the whole to more than £6,000; and whose fault occasioned the delay and expense in adjudicating the case of the brig Laura, in Antigua, complained of by Captain Hillyar, of Her Majesty's ship Cadmus, in January, 1862?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, the vessels were captured in the waters of Jamaica on the 14th and 15th of October, 1860, by the Barracouta. They had no papers on board in the usual form which was necessary for a commercial ship; they had no flag, no logbook, and no manifests, and, consequently, Commander Ward thought they were not entitled to any claim of nationality, and took them to Jamaica for adjudication, by the Vice Admiral's Court. A long correspondence ensued, and on the 6th of January, 1861, a few months afterwards, the Court declined to adjudicate without further information, and in May it declared it had no jurisdiction. The vessels had to be transferred to Havanna, to be tried by a mixed Commission; that was the cause of the delay in the case of the two first ships. As to the Laura, the delay in her case was occasioned by the owners.

TRANSFER OF LAND (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. SCULLY said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Has his attention been called to the Parliamentary Return, No. 363, as to the Transfer of Land, presented to this House on the 7th of June instant, showing that the poundage (above ad valorem Duties) paid to the Consolidated Fund was £87 6s. for obtaining indefeasible titles under the English Land Transfer Act, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53, to Estates in England, the gross value whereof was £98,499; and that the poundage (above ad valorem Duties) payable to the Consolidated Fund for obtaining indefeasible titles to Estates of the like value in Ireland, under the Irish Land Transfer Acts, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 72, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 123, would be £492 9s. 11d., being rather more than five and a half times the poundage chargeable for indefeasible titles to English Estates; and will he endeavour to remedy that anomaly through his promised measure for registering Titles to Land in Ireland?

Mr. Cave

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND), in reply, said, it was not quite certain that it would be possible to incorporate the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman in the promised measure. He would, however, see what could be done.

NAVY—THE "GLADIATOR."—QUESTION.

ADJOURNMENT.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he rose to put a Question to the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, which he was compelled to preface with some observations, and if out of order in doing so, he would move the adjournment of the House. He wished to know, Whether the Gladiator was still under orders to proceed to Cape Coast Castle; for in his opinion that vessel was utterly incompetent to remove 500 men with any degree of safety to the expedition. It was necessary to explain his reasons for that opinion, and he therefore moved the adjournment of the House. The Gladiator was a ship of 1,200 tons burden, with a main deck; but the space occupied by the boilers and ship's company reduced her carrying power to 800 tons. At that season of the year the winds prevailing in the Gulf of Guinea were from the westward, and, consequently, when the ship arrived at Cape Coast Castle and took on board the troops and baggage, she would, in her overloaded state, have to contend with contrary winds of considerable strength for 700 miles before she could turn the boundary point, where strong north-easterly winds were to be looked for. It was impossible, in the wet weather which would prevail in the Gulf of Guinea, that the Gladiator could carry below 500 men—for that was the number—448 rank and file, and 19 officers, with their followers. Some must be carried on deck, and they would be exposed to the wet from the time they left Cape Coast Castle until they arrived at their destination. He would submit for the consideration of the Government, whether it would not be better to send a ship capable of carrying these troops with safety and comfort. The Galatea, a ship of 3,000 tons, had just arrived with troops from the Mediterranean, and might be employed for that purpose. He entered his solemn protest against the Gladiator being sent on that service. In order to place himself in order, he would move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that he thought that what he was about to state would be satisfactory to the hon. Baronet. The War Office had made an arrangement by which instead of the removal of 500 men from Cape Coast Castle 700 men would be removed. Of these, 500 would go to the West Indies and 200 to Lagos. From Lagos 200 would be removed to Sierra Leone station. That had necessitated an alteration in the arrangements of the Admiralty. It was now proposed that the Gladiator should go straight to Madeira, and she had started that day. She would coal at Madeira, in order to be prepared to take in tow the Waubojess transport, which would carry the troops. The transport would start from this country on Thursday, accompanied by the Bulldog, which would tow her out of the Channel, and go with her to Madeira, if necessary. At Madeira she would find the Gladiator waiting for her. The Gladiator would tow her to Sierra Leone, and thence to Cape Coast Castle. The Waubojess would there embark the troops for Barbadoes; and the Gladiator, after towing her into the offing, if necessary, would embark the 200 men for Lagos, and from Lagos would return to Sierra Leone with about the same number of men to be stationed there. The Gladiator would thence return to England.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

THE CONFERENCE. — QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I wish to make an inquiry of Her Majesty's Government in regard to circumstances connected with the Conference. In the first place I wish to ask the Government, Whether they can give the House any information respecting a statement, believed to be perfectly authentic, on the part of the Prussian Minister, at the last meeting of the Conference? He is alleged to have stated that in case the German ports were blockaded, the German Powers would no longer consider themselves bound by the Convention of Paris in regard to privateering. I wish in the second place to learn from Her Majesty's Government whether, in case of the Conference breaking up its proceedings on Wednesday, we are to understand that hostilities will commence on the 26th? The third question is, whether, if the Conference concludes, under any circumstances, its business next Wednesday, we may understand from the Government that the protocols will be placed immediately on the table of this House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that as the Questions are of considerable importance, it would be better if he would put them on the paper. An answer will then be given to them to-morrow.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I do not think that these are Questions which it is at all necessary to place on the paper. I consider that I am perfectly justified, in the present state of affairs, in putting these Questions to Her Majesty's Government without a formal notice.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Although I fully see the inconvenience of provoking any discussion at this moment, yet, re-collecting as I do the way in which we drifted into war with Russia, and feeling the urgency of this occasion, and the very perilous precipice upon which the country stands at the present moment—I wish to ask some Member of the Government, if the noble Lord is not in his place to-night, what significance we are to attach to certain words uttered in another place, to the effect that Her Majesty's fleet is fully prepared for any service which it may be called upon to render. These words are so serious, and the peace of this country is so imperilled at this moment, that I take the first opportunity in the interests of peace of asking Her Majesty's Government what significance they place on those words—whether it is one of those idle threats which have lately been too much used in another place; or whether it is a bona fide intention to commit the suicidal act of plunging this country into a war with Germany? ["Oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen may not agree with me in thinking this to be a suicidal act, but at all events they will agree with me, that if this country is to be plunged into a war we ought to have definite and certain information, so that we shall not drift day by day into a state of things which may involve this country into a war, the end of which no man can foresee. I, therefore, hope the House will support me in this demand, and that they will insist upon knowing what is the significance of the terms that have been used in another place.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I was not aware the adjournment of the House had been moved. I am very sorry that inconvenience should arise either to the right hon. Gentleman or to others with respect to the circumstances in which we stand. But no intimation was given to me, or, as far as I am aware, to any other Member of the Government, of the right hon. Gentleman's Questions, until the moment when they were put, and I must confess it appears to me that it would be greatly for the convenience and advantage of the House if notice were given before such Questions were put. At any rate, it so happens that these Questions have been asked in the absence of my noble Friend at the head of the Government. I have had no communication with him on the subject, and it rests with him to represent the Government in this House upon matters of this great importance. In my opinion I should altogether have departed from my duty if I had answered the Questions put to me in any other way than by respectfully recommending, as I did, that notice of them should be given for to-morrow.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Sir, I fully admit that it is for the convenience of the House that ordinarily notice should be given of important questions. But there are times—emergencies—there are occasions of so serious a character as to justify Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House in insisting, as far as they can, on having a definite answer from the Government as to their intentions in a crisis such as this. It is not, Sir, as if every member of the Cabinet was not in full possession of the circumstances of the case. Every member of the Cabinet must be aware of what passed on Saturday, and there is not a member of the Cabinet sitting on that Bench who is not capable of giving an answer to the Questions of my right hon. Friend. I trust that the House will insist on having a definite answer.

After a pause,

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH: It appears that on this serious Question the Government is not in a position to give an answer; they are here without their head; they are a corpus entirely deprived of that which would give them any vitality. The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that he is speaking for a divided Government on this subject. I venture to say that no one hon. Member of the Government will deny that assertion. I apprehend that all our information is derived from the ordinary public means, which, whilst they give us information coming from abroad of what transpires here, also inform us of the divided state of the Government. I hope the words referred to by the hon.

Member for Liskeard (Mr. Bernal Osborne) will have the vitality and force he attributed to them. I trust they are words of power, and that in a few days we shall have a Government that will intimate to the despotic powers of the Continent who are now oppressing a weaker nation, that we have a mind of our own in England, and are not prepared to see the just influence of this country in abeyance on a subject in which we have taken so great a part, and our recommendations thrown back in our faces with insult and contumely. It is certain if we put forth our right arm—the naval strength of the country—in a manner suited to the dignity of the nation, we should soon see the objects for which the Conference was commenced satisfactorily accomplished.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, I think the speech of the hon. Member for Liskeard must have shown Her Majesty's Government that the interest felt in this subject is not confined to this side of the House. I am sure that when these few observations are read by the country to-morrow, people will feel and will probably express a deep sense of the position in which the House of Commons is placed by the refusal of information on the part of Her Majesty's Government upon those questions which excite the country from one end to the other. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated, that in the absence of the noble Lord and of notice of the intention to ask these Questions, it is impossible for him or any other Member of the Government to reply to them. But, Sir, I think that on the eve of such important and momentous events, if it be true that there is no Member of Her Majesty's Government competent or willing to reply to Questions of this importance except the noble Lord himself, then it is the duty of that noble Lord to be here in his place. [Viscount PALMERSTON at this moment entered the House.] I rejoice to see that the noble Lord has taken his seat. I trust he will be able and willing to give that information which hitherto has been asked in vain from Her Majesty's Government. Probably the noble Lord will be informed by one of his Colleagues who sits next him what the information sought for is. [SIR GEORGE GREY: Repeat the Questions.] Well, then, I will repeat them, and I ask—first, Whether Her Majesty's Government can give the House any information with respect to the declaration alleged to have been made at the Conference on Saturday by the representative of Prussia, that in the event of the blockade of the German ports being in their opinion inefficiently carried out, Prussia would depart from the stipulations on the subject of privateering contained in the Treaty of Paris? secondly, Whether in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, if the Conference should terminate its labours unfavourably on Wednesday, the resumption of hostilities on Monday next may be expected? and thirdly, Whether, in the event of the Conference terminating on Wednesday, under any circumstances, the Protocols containing the proceedings of the Conference will be immediately placed on the table of this House?

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I hope the noble Viscount will also give an explanation as to the significance of the words used by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, in another place, that the fleet was prepared to go anywhere. Were those words used in a warlike sense?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My noble Friend was asked a Question, whether the British fleet is in a condition to do anything that might be required of it? [MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: The question was, whether it is prepared to go to the Baltic?] Well, the Baltic or anywhere else. My noble Friend's answer was, in the words of the Duke of Wellington about his army, that the fleet is prepared to go anywhere and do anything. ["Oh, oh!"] I think the British fleet is perfectly capable of performing any service. I do not think that indicates any particular service. I say generally, whatever contingency may happen, the British fleet, I am persuaded, will be found prepared. With regard to the Questions put by the right hon. Gentleman, and repeated by the noble Lord, I would rather decline to state what passed at the Conference held on Saturday or any other day. There was an agreement that what passed at the Conference should not be made public. I am sorry to say that many reports have got abroad as to what has passed between the Ministers at the Conference; but I am sure the House will see that a statement made in breach of confidence, whoever may have committed that breach, is a very different thing from a statement made by the Minister of the Crown in this House, which carries with it authenticity, and which might give rise to discussions which certainly ought to be avoided. With regard to the next Question, whether hostilities would be resumed on Monday next in the event of the Conference not terminating favourably on Wednesday next, I can only say how matters now stand. The suspension of hostilities expires, I think, on Sunday, and if there is no other agreement made before that time, if the belligerent parties should not have agreed to some arrangements calculated to restore peace, or should not happen to have come to any understanding as to boundaries, and the suspension should not be renewed, a state of hostilities will of course commence when the suspension expires. With regard to the third Question, I have to say that whenever the negotiations are over it will no doubt be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to lay the proceedings of the Conference before Parliament, and no delay that can be avoided will possibly take place. Probably a day or a couple of days may intervene before that can be done.

MR. BRIGHT: Perhaps the noble Viscount is not able to give the House an assurance at present that the armistice will be prolonged. I know it would be desirable to give all the information that could possibly be given, because it is obvious that there must be a great feeling of interest in the country on the subject. I do not credit hon. Gentlemen opposite with a greater desire for peace than Her Majesty's Government. But the country has a great interest in knowing what the Government may be able fairly to tell us. I have never asked a question on the subject before, nor do I now. But though there may be good guesses or bad guesses as to what a certain plenipotentiary has done, it is clearly not the duty of the Minister, however great the anxiety may be, to divulge facts, which as a Minister represented in the Conference he is pledged to keep secret. But I think the noble Viscount would get on more easily if he should tell the House all he can, and I should be most happy if he should be able to tell us anything tending to show that peace is likely to come from the negotiations which have been carried on now for some weeks past.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: There is, no doubt, a great anxiety in the country for the continued preservation of peace, and I am quite aware that this House must feel a strong desire to know everything that can be properly communicated with regard to the negotiations. I very much regret that my tongue is tied, and stances in which we stand. But no intimation was given to me, or, as far as I am aware, to any other Member of the Government, of the right hon. Gentleman's Questions, until the moment when they were put, and I must confess it appears to me that it would be greatly for the convenience and advantage of the House if notice were given before such Questions were put. #### INDIA—THE LATE MARQUESS OF DALHOUSIE.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he rose to solicit the permission of the House to ask a Question with respect to a statement which was made by the hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. H. Baillie) in the debate on the previous Monday evening. He would not for a moment ask the indulgence of the House in transgressing the rule which prohibited reference to a past debate, were it not that the statement to which he referred affected deeply the character of a public man. His hon. Friend stated, as reported in The Times, that the Marquess of Dalhousie a short time before quitting India, in the plenitude of his power, and with all the arrogance of office, told a Native Prince that he regarded him no more than the dust beneath his feet. That Prince was the Nizam. That statement, when made, surprised him (Sir James Fergusson), and he thought it right to ascertain at the India Office whether it was well founded or not. He had to thank the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Wood) for having granted him every facility. As far as the knowledge of any of the persons at the India Office went, no such expression occurred in any of the documents at the office, and a few of those who were confidentially acquainted with the late Marquess, told him that to the best of their knowledge no such thing had taken place. Having thus taken all the trouble he could to ascertain the facts, and as the members of the late Marquess's family felt pained at the allegation, he wrote to his hon. Friend to ask whether he had any authority for such a statement, and whether he could mention where such a sentence had occurred? His hon. Friend was unable to mention his authority, but said he would try to discover it. It would be most agreeable to him if his hon. Friend would state that he had not intended to say that the words were written or spoken by the Marquess of Dalhousie; but since his hon. Friend was not prepared to take that course, he begged to ask upon what authority he attributed the words to the Marquess of Dalhousie?

Viscount Palmerston

MR. H. BAILLIE said, when his hon. and gallant Friend spoke to him shortly after the debate, he (Mr. Baillie) told him that he had read the statement, though he could not for the moment say where it was to be found, but he would look for it. He had now to refer his hon. and gallant Friend in the first place to a very able article upon Indian affairs, which appeared in the July number of the Quarterly Review of 1858. The words which he used in the House would be found at page 265. Those words were published in the Quarterly Review during the time the Marquess of Dalhousie was alive, and, as far as he knew, had never been contradicted. In the next place he would refer his hon. and gallant Friend to a more learned work which had been lately published by Mr. Dickinson, a gentleman well versed in Indian affairs—a very interesting book upon the annexation of the principality of Dhar—and at page 27 he would find the statement repeated, and said to be on the very highest authority. [Sir JAMES FERGUSSON: What authority?] It was stated to be on the very highest authority. The hon. and gallant Officer, no doubt, would find the statement in a despatch in the archives of Hyderabad.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman, Whether as a Member of Parliament, and one who had held a position connected with the Board of Control, he felt justified in making the statement with no other authority.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he conceived that when such a statement appeared in a publication like the Quarterly Review, and remained uncontradicted for six years, a Member of Parliament was justified in quoting it as authentic.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES, &c. BILL.

[BILL 114.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer).

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he rose to congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the successful result which had attended the consideration of the Bill in the Select Committee, to which he had consented to refer it. As originally brought in, the Bill consisted of three clauses, and it had come out of the Select Committee consisting of seventeen clauses, sixteen of which, together with the preamble and title, were entirely new. He would also congratulate the hon. Baronet the Member for Hertford for having suggested that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee; and the course of proceeding pursued in that Committee showed that there was no intention on the part of any of the Members to prevent the passing of the measure or to do it any sort of damage. Before the Bill was sent to a Select Committee he had made some objections to it, and as they had now been removed, he wished briefly to advert to some of the points in respect to which the Bill had been amended. One of the objections he had taken was that the Government were proceeding in a course likely to interfere with private enterprise—that was to say, with Insurance Offices; but that objection was quite removed by the introduction of words limiting any contract for payment to be made on the death of a person to an amount not greater than £100. He had expressed an apprehension that the Bill ran the risk of interfering, not with the larger and profitable concerns, but with what he cared for more—namely, those establishments which the working men got up and managed for their own purposes. That objection had also been removed by the enactment that no contracts for payment to be made on the death of a person should be of a less amount than £20. Another important restriction was introduced into the Bill, and it was that which provided that the tables on which the payments of a sum on death were to be calculated should be based on a 3 per cent rate. In that way all fear of unfair competition, which might have been surmised as possible to be carried on under the first Bill, had been entirely removed. He had on a former occasion stated that if by experience it should be found that the tables were not accurately prepared, a loss might be thrown upon the Consolidated Fund, but his objections on that head had been very much removed by the statements which he heard in the Select Committee from the able civil servants of the Government. He thought that the Bill in its present shape was a good Bill, and no one more disposed to see it passed than he did. If a master or employer wished to make a provision by way of annuity for a faithful servant in his old age, he could do so with perfect security under the Bill, and without incurring any such risk as the breaking up of an Insurance Office. The Bill would also be of use to the great mass of labourers in this country. It would be in the power of a young workman about to marry, and it would be his duty, to make provision for his wife and family by taking advantage of the provisions of the Bill. He thought that if the working people of this country did not derive great advantage from the measure it would be their own fault.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he was glad to hear what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, because at one period it was doubtful whether the present admirable measure would pass. He thought it would prove a most useful Act, as it gave to the working classes such a security as they were entitled to. The country at large would be benefited by the reduction of the poor's rate, while the poor being relieved from the hardship of being thrown on the bounty of others would be advanced in the social scale.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he should not have taken up so much of the time of the House in an earlier stage of the Bill had he not felt convinced that it was unfitted to carry out the object which the framer had in view. In its present shape he believed that object would be effected; and he trusted that it would confer great benefits on the country. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that he was opposed to the principle. That was not so. His objection was only as to the form of the measure, which he believed had been rendered unobjectionable by the examination which it had undergone. His right hon. Friend had shown great patience and courtesy in his conduct of the measure throughout, and he considered the House and the country had every reason to thank him. He wished, however, to ask him, Whether a person who paid money into a savings bank on account of life insurance would be considered as a depositor in a savings bank so as to bring him within the provisions of the Savings Bank Act, which prohibited a person from having two accounts at the savings bank?

MR. AYRTON said, that when the Bill was formerly under the consideration of the House a great sensation was created throughout the country, because the working classes believed it would come into collision with Benefit Societies. The result of the labours of the Committee was that no such collision of interests, and no such opposition, would arise between the Bill and Benefit Societies; but in order to obviate all doubt upon the point, the Committee had agreed to introduce a clause providing that insurances under the provisions of the Bill should not be effected for a less sum than £20, the result of which would be that Trade and Benefit Societies would not be affected by the measure. There being thus a distinct declaration on the part of the Legislature, that it was not intended to supersede Benefit and Trade Societies, it necessarily followed that the Government were bound to direct their attention to the condition of these institutions, with the view of correcting any evils and abuses to which they might be subject. It was not right that there should be any ground for the belief that the 20,000 Benefit Societies in the country were so constituted as, in any degree, to leave the door open for fraud and reckless mismanagement. Legislation on the subject was the more necessary as no substitute could be found for those societies, the chief mission of which was to provide for contingencies much nearer to the present life of the working man than those contemplated in the present measure. Philanthropic Members might perhaps imagine that the thoughts of the labouring man were directed to a time twenty or thirty years hence, when he would be old, or perhaps dead; but the truth was, that he was too much engrossed in the struggling life of today to exercise such foresight. He was obliged to consider chiefly how to provide against sickness or any of the other casualties to which he was liable. Another contingency was the burial of his children, for which purpose he had to subscribe to a burial fund. These various arrangements were built one on another, and all came within the scope of the Benefit and Trade Societies—the difference between which was that the latter offered aid in the event of the loss of employment, as well as of sickness or any other accident. In that way the taxpayers were relieved from many claims which would otherwise be made on them in the shape of poor rates, and from every point of view Benefit and Trade Societies deserved the serious and anxious consideration of the Government and of Parliament. He therefore hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not think he had done enough in bringing forward the scheme before the House, and that legislation in regard to these societies, as in regard to savings banks, would not be left to the enterprize of a private Member. The responsibility of dealing with the subject rested on the Government; and in his opinion they were bound to bring forward a complete and salutary measure so as to afford all the relief that legislation could give. There was some alarm on the part of persons connected with savings banks lest an insurance was to be treated as a deposit account and held to preclude any other deposit account in another savings bank. It was certainly not the intention of the Committee that such should be the case, and he should be glad to learn what construction the Chancellor of the Exchequer put on the provision.

MR. VANCE observed, that he had received complaints from some of his constituents of the hardship it was to many persons in humble life who had invested money in the National Debt Office in order to secure small annuities, that payments were made only in London, thus involving considerable expense for agency and stamps in the case of persons who lived in other parts of the kingdom. He hoped the Government would consider whether they could not do anything to remedy that inconvenience, by authorizing the annuities to be paid in Edinburgh and Dublin as well as London.

MR. GREGSON expressed his general approbation of the measure, which had undergone considerable improvement in Committee.

MR. J. A. SMITH said, he believed the operation of the measure would be beneficial. There could be no doubt that in too many cases the funds of existing Benefit Societies were misapplied to feasting and entertainments; and he hoped the Registrar would carry out his intention of disallowing such expenses. As to the deferred annuities, he knew, from experience in his own parish, that they were scarcely understood by the labouring classes. In his parish an office had been open for the sale of deferred annuities for five years, and during that period there had not been a single applicant. The measure would be most serviceable to the mechanics in the towns, but he trusted that in time its advantages would be extended to the population in rural districts.

MR. CAVE said, the Bill was valuable as far as it went, but he could corroborate what had been stated as to the absolute necessity for regulating the Benefit Societies in a more effectual manner. These societies were of even more importance than any system of deferred annuities to the ordinary day-labourer, who, at the present rate of wages, could do little more than provide against sickness and other contingencies of to-day, without thinking of the future. He did not suppose, therefore, that many members of this body would avail themselves of the Government annuities, which would, however, be of value to other classes. He thought it was the duty of the Government, with the least possible delay, to bring in a Bill for the better regulation of Benefit Societies. The existing law was quite inoperative, and was also extremely unpopular. Working men sometimes boasted that it was easy to drive a coach and six through any of Mr. Tidd Pratt's regulations, and besides they resented the interference of the Registrar as an infringement of their liberty of action. He lately became acquainted with a society, one of the rules of which was that one-eighth of the subscriptions should be spent in drink. If any one would carry out this calculation in reference to the investment of large sums he would see the monstrous absurdity of these regulations. In a police report the other day the case of a man was brought forward who had been expelled in consequence of being sick too often. The magistrate ordered him to be restored, but the managers pleaded that there was nothing in the box, but promised that when there was anything he should partake of it. The society had been ruined in consequence of so many of the members coming upon the sick fund. It was sad to see any man who had worked hard all his life brought to the close of it with no better prospect than the workhouse, but it was sadder still to see a man who by prudence and saving had put by a provision for age and sickness, deprived of it through the faults of others. These were matters which demanded serious attention.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I shall commence the few remarks I have to make by answering one or two by-questions which have been put to me in the course of this conversation. The hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Vance) has heard complaints from some of his constituents that annuities purchased in the National Debt Office are payable only in London. There are two systems at present in operation. One is the sale of annuities in the National Debt Office in London—in those cases the dividends are payable here; the other is the purchase of annuities through savings banks—in that case the dividends are payable where the annuities have been purchased. As far as this Bill goes, it will spread the sale of annuities all over the country, and the dividends will be payable wherever the annuities are sold. If the hon. Member wishes to know whether an annuity can be transferred from the National Debt Office after it has once been purchased there, I am sorry to say that at this moment I am unable to give him the requisite information, because I am not aware the question has ever been raised; but if he will kindly furnish me with the circumstances of any given case, I shall be glad to recur to the subject on a future occasion.

A question has been put to me by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) and others to the effect, whether a person who may become an assurer of life under this Bill, and who, on that account, will be entitled by law to be subjected to the Savings Banks Acts, will not bring himself under the operation of the disability imposed by those Acts, forbidding any person holding two accounts at the same time. Now I have great satisfaction in stating that the words used in this Bill are mere repetitions of the words which have been in force ever since the system of public annuities was first introduced, dating as far back as 1833. Public annuities have since been purchasable through savings banks, with the condition that the Savings Banks Acts should be applicable to them, and consequently liable to the force of the objection, whatever that may be, with respect to the opening of two accounts. After an experience extending over thirty years, I may say confidently that there is no legal difficulty in the matter, and that a man who purchases an annuity, or makes a Life Assurance, will not be understood as opening an account in the sense of a savings bank deposit.

With respect to this Bill as a whole, it is, of course, a matter of great satisfaction to me that as it entered this House in peace and quietness, so it is likely to quit it with general expressions of good-will. I am glad the right hon. Member for Wilts (Mr. Sotherton-Estcourt) has thought it right to raise a special discussion upon the third reading, because it gives me an opportunity of doing that which it is both a pleasure and a duty for me to do; and that is frankly to tender my best acknowledgments to all the Members of the Select Committee, without any exception or distinction—between those who had originally favoured and those who had originally objected to my proposal—for the very valuable assistance they have given in maturing and developing this measure. When the Bill was first introduced into the House it contained little more than the recognition of a general principle, together with a maximum limit of amount, and our intention was to provide by regulations all the subsidiary particulars which would be necessary in order to constitute a working scheme; but the discussions which took place upon the Bill led me to put on the notice-paper a number of clauses, and, very naturally, after the subject had attracted so much attention from Parliament, there was a disposition to embody in the Bill various points of regulation and management. The result is that there will be greater confidence felt in the working of the measure by those who may place themselves under its operation; and not only so, but the members of the Select Committee, by their advice and suggestions, have rendered valuable assistance towards the formation of a useful set of rules. As respects the unanimity of the Committee, I may mention that the principal, if not the only difference of opinion we had related to a question of great interest and importance both in itself and viewed as a mere legal problem—the question whether those assurances which are to be effected under this Bill should be a property transferable at law? The Committee decided by a majority that they should be transferable, and I confess I am well satisfied with that decision, and, indeed, I might have had some difficulty in acquiescing in the contrary view. If a proof were wanting, after the animation of the debates which took place upon the Bill in its earlier stages, of the undisturbed impartiality of the minds of those who set about the consideration of the clauses in Committee upstairs, I could not give a stronger or more conclusive one than the fact that in the division which occurred upon this subject nearly all those who supported my view of the clause as it stands were the original objectors to the Bill, and the most prominent among the opponents of the clause were hon. Gentlemen who had from the first been favourable to the principle of the measure. I am inclined to think that a greater proof of judicial impartiality could hardly be conceived.

The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets raises an important question when he says that this Bill will leave a large province still open to and still occupied by institutions independent of the Government. Of that I have no doubt whatever. I have no doubt that the competition of the Government will be highly useful to existing societies. I believe, too, that the operation of this measure will tend rather to extend the total area of provident arrangements of this kind than to diminish the actual space now occupied by voluntary institutions. But the hon. and learned Member truly says that there is a case for legislation with regard to the present constitution of Benefit and Friendly Societies; he hopes I shall not, on the part of the Government, shrink from the responsibility of that legislation; and he regrets that in the case of savings banks it was left to the hon. Member for Evesham and himself to introduce a measure of reform. I do not wish to avoid responsibility, either on my own part or on the part of the Government, and here I may speak the more freely because I do not know that general legislation on the subject of Benefit and Friendly Societies, if it fell to the share of the Government, would be so appropriately lodged in the hands of a Finance Minister as in those of the heads of several other Departments of the Executive; but I may be permitted to point out that there are certain subjects upon which independent Members, well qualified for the task, are much more efficient legislators than the Government. There are certain subjects upon which an independent Member who is known to feel nothing but a benevolent interest in the question, and who by his experience, by his general ability, and by his station has acquired public confidence, can do a great deal more than can be done by a Minister, because he is free from that suspicion and jealousy which naturally—nay more, which very properly—attends upon and watches all steps taken by the Government. I have no doubt that if the right hon. Member for Wilts had not been at the moment withdrawn from us by indisposition he would have been in a condition to exemplify in regard to savings banks that which I have now stated; but at any rate it was exemplified by the hon. Member for Evesham and the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets when they introduced and carried their Bill. No doubt the course was cleared for them by our legislation with respect to Post Office savings banks. That legislation produced a willingness on the part of the older institutions to be handled and manipulated afresh by the Legislature, which was greater than they had shown on former occasions; but I do not believe it would have been in my power to do that which was done by the hon. Member for Evesham and the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets with such slender assistance, or at least goodwill, as I was able to give them in the passing of their valuable, though necessarily stringent, measure for rectifying the constitution and governing the proceedings of the old savings banks. What I will venture to say is this—I think we must see the plan embodied in this Bill in operation before we can have so much additional light thrown upon the subject as will enable us to judge whether new legislation ought to be applied to existing Friendly and Benefit Societies. That this Bill will lead to that legislation I entertain little doubt, but I think we must see it fairly at work before dealing with so important a subject. I hope that during these discussions I have not at any time appeared to question the motives or intentions of the hon. Baronet the Member for Hertford (Sir Minto Farquhar), and that, however sharply we may be opposed upon this, that, or the other question, no word will ever fall from me inconsistent with the warmest personal regard or with the most implicit confidence in every statement he makes in this House. On this occasion I am glad to be able to render special thanks to him and to the right hon. Member for Wilts, and to say that I can very well both accept and return their congratulations, because I feel that, though starting with different points of view, we have laboured cordially together to perfect a measure of no little importance. Nor can I sit down without saying that another Member of this House who did not serve upon the Committee, because he was unwilling to interfere with others, deserves the warmest thanks from me for the part he has taken in promoting this Bill. The hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) is very well known as one of the most active philanthropists of the age: it is to him in a great degree that I owe the suggestions which led to the introduction of this Bill, and I beg to return him my best acknowledgments.

GAOLS BILL—[BILL 93.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I wish, Sir, to make a short statement to the House of the general purport and objects of this Bill. The Bill is founded, in a great measure, on the Report of a Select Committee appointed by the other House of Parliament in the course of last Session, to consider and report upon the present state of discipline in gaols and houses of correction. That Committee stated at the outset of their Report—and no one can dispute their statement—that many and wide differences exist as regards construction, labour, diet, and general discipline in the various gaols and houses of correction in England and Wales; and the opinion of the Committee, as distinctly expressed in the second paragraph of their Report, was that it is desirable to establish without delay a system approaching as nearly as may be practicable to an uniformity of labour, diet, and treatment. Now, in that general object, I must express my entire assent, but I believe it is impossible to obtain absolute uniformity in these respects unless you subvert the existing system of local administration, which I, for one, should be sorry to see superseded in regard to borough and county prisons. If you are to retain the management of those gaols in the hands of local gentlemen not all agreeing in their views, but acting in accordance with certain general rules, with a certain margin for the exercise of their own opinion, you must be prepared to sacrifice something of that absolute uniformity which it may be desirable to attain. For instance, we should all doubtless be glad to see established a system of uniformity in respect to the punishments awarded to crimes of equal magnitude; but when you have your criminal law administered by fifteen Judges as well as by the Courts of Quarter Sessions and by Recorders, you must submit to some inequalities and anomalies, and some variety both in the punishments awarded and the mode in which they are carried into effect. At the same time it is desirable to do as much as you can, consistently with maintaining the present system of administration, to promote such a general uniformity in the labour, diet, and treatment of our gaols as the Lords' Committee suggest. But with all respect for that Committee, I think that in stating the want of uniformity which exists, they overlook much of the progress made within the last few years towards the attainment of uniformity. I hold in my hand the copy of an official letter of the Inspectors of Prisons, which is contained in the papers before the House; and in that document they state—

"It was no doubt one of the objects the Lords' Committee of 1835 had in view in advising the appointment of official Inspectors, to secure a general uniformity of discipline; and it is equally true that that object has not been attained to the fullest extent; but this partial failure of the views of the Lords' Committee has not been occasioned by any want of activity on the part of the Inspectors, but it is owing to the tardiness of the local authorities in adopting the recommendations made by them. The want of improvement, however, and the absence of uniformity of practice are not so great as might be inferred from the terms of the Report; on the contrary, the recommendations of the Inspectors have been acted upon in a great majority of instances—witness the extensive adoption of separate confinement, which has been in a great measure brought about by their urgent and repeated representations. In the last twenty years the number of prisons in which the separate system has been either wholly or partially adopted has increased from two to seventy-nine in England, and in Scotland it has been more or less introduced into sixty-one prisons; and while the number of cells certified for the separate confinement of prisoners under the provisions of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 56, has increased from 200 to 14,959 in England, 2,158 cells have also been certified as fit to be used for this form of discipline in Scotland. Further, there are in course of construction in the county prisons at Preston, Kirkdale, Cold-bath Fields, Lancaster, Salford, and Stafford, nearly 2,000 more cells on the improved principle. These facts show that there has been a progressive improvement in the structure as well as in the discipline of prisons in Great Britain, which is still going on, and which is due more or less to the recommendation of the Inspectors."

I have thought it right to call the attention of the House to that statement, because it shows that at present, without any change in the law, great improvements are going on as to the attainment of uniformity in the construction of prisons, and in thereby rendering them capable of applying uniform punishment to the prisoners confined within them. But I fully admit that more may be done for the same object; and it is with that view, and in accordance with the suggestions, as well as with the general spirit, of the Lords' Committee of last Session that this Bill has been framed.

Sir George Grey

I will deal with the subject very much in the order in which it is treated by that Committee. I take first the question of hard labour. The Committee say, and say truly, that great variety exists in the mode of enforcing hard labour in different prisons; and they observe that in one or more prisons, the means of putting prisoners to hard labour does not exist, and that although particular prisoners have been sentenced to undergo that punishment, the opinion of the magistrates has been that separate confinement was of itself sufficient for them, and they have practically disregarded the law. Having touched on the differences which exist in the mode of enforcing hard labour, the Lords' Committee come to their own recommendation on the subject, to which I invite the attention of the House, for it bears directly on the point raised by the Resolution of which the right hon. Member for Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley) has given notice—namely, as to the definition of hard labour. In their Report the Committee say—

"The first step towards a better and more uniform system throughout the country would, in the opinion of the Committee, be found in an authoritative definition by Act of Parliament of the term of hard labour. Nor does there seem to be in this any practical difficulty. Of the various forms which are in force in the several prisons, the treadwheel, crank, and shot drill alone appear to the Committee properly to merit this designation of hard labour. Of these, the treadwheel and the crank form the principal elements of penal discipline, and might safely be described as such in any future Act of Parliament."

"They further recommend that all gaols and houses of correction shall, as a condition to their receipt of the Treasury allowance, both be provided with a sufficient supply of hard labour machinery for the average number of male prisoners sentenced to and medically fit for hard labour, and be annually certified to the Secretary of State as giving the full daily minimum work on treadwheel or crank, as described above."

I have had to consider these recommendations of the Committee. They first of all propose that there shall be an authoritative definition of hard labour, and they suggest that it should be confined to three modes of enforcing it, the treadwheel, the crank and shot drill; and they further recommend that, as a condition to their receipt of the Treasury allowance, all gaols and houses of correction shall be required to possess an adequate hard labour machinery, and be annually certified to the Secretary of State as duly enforcing this form of punishment. I have come to the conclusion that it would be impossible to adopt the first part of these recommendations, and enact an authoritative definition of the term "hard labour," but that it would be expedient to adopt the other part—namely, that proper means should be taken to ascertain that hard labour can be and is practically enforced in gaols and houses of correction. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, as I have mentioned, has placed on the paper the notice of a Resolution on this subject, and I may here say that, differing as he does with the conclusion to which I have come, and thinking that there should be this Parliamentary authoritative definition of hard labour, if he will in Committee on this Bill propose a clause giving effect to his view, I shall be happy to give it a candid consideration, trusting it may be found sufficient to answer its purpose. But the Committee of the House of Lords appear to have overlooked the difficulties connected with the application of their rule as to hard labour, and if the right hon. Gentleman concurs with that Committee, I would ask him, "Does he think that either the three forms of hard labour included in their definition could be strictly enforced upon women?" It is easy to say that the crank, for example, shall be the hard labour which Parliament requires; but the Committee say that the construction of the treadmill and the crank differs so much in different gaols that they may be either made instruments of excessive punishment, or of punishment too light to be entitled to the name of hard labour. In page 4 of the Report the right hon. Gentleman will find what they say with regard to the crank, showing that it is a most unequal instrument of punishment. It is impossible for Parliament to define what the pressure on the axis of the crank shall be, or how it shall be applied, or what time a prisoner shall be kept at it. And if that be so, you must, as at present, give the local authorities a large discretion as to these points. I have, therefore, thought it better to leave it to the justices of the several prisons to devise those means of enforcing hard labour which, owing to the construction of their particular prisons, they may think are the only or the most available means of doing so, and then to leave it to the Secretary of State to see whether there has been such a substantial compliance with the requirements of the law as would warrant the payment of the Treasury allowance. I propose in this Bill to establish the same check upon the arbitrary exercise of the discretion vested in the Secretary of State which now exists in the case of the Constabulary Act, and to require that when the certificate is withheld the correspondence on the subject shall be laid before Parliament, that Parliament may have an opportunity of deciding whether that discretion has been satisfactorily exercised or not. The right hon. Gentleman will, I hope, excuse me for seeming to anticipate his Motion; but I repeat, that if, instead of proposing by a vague general resolution to impose on me a duty which I am unable satisfactorily to perform, he will submit a clause in Committee defining hard labour which can be safely and properly applied, I shall be happy to give it the best consideration.

The next clause has reference to the power of the Secretary of State to make rules for the government of gaols. It was objected to by the right hon. Member for Staffordshire, and I am glad to have the opportunity of explaining it, because a most unaccountable misunderstanding appears to prevail on the subject. It has been supposed that it gives some extraordinary powers which were never acted upon before. Now, let me call the attention of the House to what the present law on the subject is. By the present law certain general rules have been enacted for the government of gaols, but the Legislature, thinking it absolutely essential that in addition to these stereotyped rules there should exist some means of making supplementary rules applicable to prisons generally or to particular prisons, gave a power to justices to make rules, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State. Now, just compare the present state of the law with what is proposed under this clause. By the 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 28, s. 5, it is enacted—

"That on or before the 1st day of November in every year the clerks of the peace for every county, riding, or division of a county in England and Wales, the clerks of every gaol sessions, and the chief magistrates of every city, town, borough, port, or liberty within England and Wales, now having any prison, shall transmit copies of all rules and regulations in force on the 25th day of September in such year for the government of every prison for and belonging to their respective counties, ridings, or divisions of counties, cities, towns, boroughs, ports, and liberties, to one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, together with copies of such new or additional rules and regulations as may be proposed for the government thereof; and it shall be lawful for such Secretary of State to alter such rules or regulations, copies whereof shall be transmitted to him in pursuance of this Act, and to make additional rules or regulations thereto, and to subscribe a certificate or declaration that such rules and regulations as are transmitted to him, or altered or added to, are proper to be enforced, and the rules and regulations, alterations, and additions so certified shall be binding upon sheriffs and all other persons; and the clerks of the peace for every county, riding, or division of a county in England and Wales, the clerks of every gaol sessions, and the chief magistrates of every such city, town, borough, port, and liberty, are hereby required to lay before the Court of Quarter Sessions, held next after the 25th day of September in every year, for their respective counties, ridings, divisions of counties, cities, towns, boroughs, ports and liberties, on the 1st day of such Sessions, like copies of all rules and regulations in force on the 25th day of September in every year for the government of their respective prisons."

That shows that it is in the power of the Secretary of State now, if he chooses, to alter the rules and regulations transmitted to him in pursuance of this Act, and to make additional rules, regulations, alterations, and additions which should be binding, &c. The word "annul" does not occur, although I do not know why it does not; but the word is really immaterial. This is not all, however. By another clause it is enacted—

"That in case of any clerk of the peace, clerk of gaol sessions, or chief magistrate of any city, town, borough, port or liberty, neglecting or omitting to transmit to one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State copies of the rules or regulations in force for the government of any prison which he is required by this Act to transmit, it shall be lawful for one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, after the 1st day of December in every year, to certify what rules and regulations he deems necessary for the government of such prison; and the rules and regulations so certified by such Secretary of State shall thenceforth be binding upon sheriffs and all other persons, and shall be the only rules in force for the government of such prison."

Now, what is the effect of this clause? That the Secretary of State has power to alter, annul, or add to all rules and regulations for the government of gaols, not only when they have been sent up to him, but where such rules and regulations have not been transmitted to him, he has power absolutely, after the 1st of December in every year, to make rules which shall be binding without appeal on the authorities of the gaols. Now the simple effect of this clause is to enable the Secretary of State to do at any time what at present under the existing law he is now empowered to do between the 25th of September and the 1st of December in every year. I am therefore utterly unable to account for the petitions that have been presented against this clause of the Bill. They came chiefly from some very zealous persons who think they have discovered some hidden motive on my part under this clause of subverting the Protestant religion, and imposing on every prison in England the services of a Roman Catholic chaplain. These petitions came from the Protestant Reformation Society and similar institutions, and they express in very explicit terms that it is intended by this means to deprive the authorities of the prisons of the discretion vested in them by the Ministers Act of last Session to make rules incompatible with that Act. If those who signed these petitions were more conversant with our system of legislation they would know that no rules which the Secretary of State could make would supersede an Act of Parliament. But this only shows, when an idea once gets hold of very honest but ill-informed minds, how difficult it is to eradicate it. I will only add that, if I find after we go into Committee the explanation I have now offered is not entirely satisfactory, I shall have no objection to strike out the clause altogether — so little importance do I attach to it. The Committee further recommended that all rules should be included in one Act of Parliament, but I do not think that necessary or practicable, although I quite admit that it would be desirable some additional rules should be inserted in the Bill.

I come now to that part of the Bill which relates to the construction of prisons. Here, again, I wish to advert to the Report of the Committee. With regard to separation, the Committee say—

"They have observed from the evidence submitted to them that in many of the best gaols a large proportion of the cells are below the precise standard of size, and consequently uncertified by the Inspector. Such cells, however, appear to be used under certain conditions, without prejudice to the administration of the prison or the health of the prisoners. While, for the future, the fullest development is given to the separate system, it will be for the Secretary of State to consider how far the practical object in view may be met, and the difficulties arising out of the expense of a reconstruction of many prisons obviated, by allowing a certain proportion of cells below the average standard to be certified and sanctioned, it being understood that the occupants of those cells shall consist of prisoners undergoing short sentences, who shall be chiefly employed during the day upon hard labour outside their cells."

The sixth clause of the Bill gives effect to that recommendation—that cells may be certified for short periods of separate confinement. That will, no doubt, enable the system of separate imprisonment to be adopted in many prisons where it could not otherwise be so, owing to the cells not being large enough. The Committee go on to recommend—

“That legislative measures be taken as speedily as possible to render the adoption of separation obligatory upon all gaols and houses of correction in England and Wales, and that the payment of the proportion of the charge now issued from the public revenues in aid of the county and borough prisons be made contingent in each case on the adoption of the separate system.”

The fifth clause of the Bill gives effect to that recommendation. We can only effect the object which the Committee of the Lords had in view by requiring that the prisons should be so constructed as to be adapted to separate imprisonment; and the way in which we propose to do this is to enable the Secretary of State to require the authorities of any inadequate prison to remedy the defects, in order that the prison may be made capable of enforcing the discipline which it is desirable should be enforced; and on failure of the authority to whom such order may be addressed to comply with its requisitions, the Secretary of State may, by a further order addressed to the keeper of said gaol, desire him to remove the prisoners to any other gaol the authority of which may consent to receive them, and may make any equitable agreement on behalf of the authority of the inadequate gaol with the consenting authority for the lodging and maintenance of the prisoners so transferred.

The Committee further recommended an amalgamation of small gaols with the larger prisons, in order to secure greater economy and efficiency of administration. It is no doubt desirable to give effect to that recommendation after due inquiry into the special circumstances of each case, and accordingly a number of small borough gaols have been scheduled in this Bill for abolition. Many small buildings in some towns are, I believe, quite unfit for the reception of prisoners except for very short periods, and the Inspectors are quite agreed as to the propriety of that recommendation of the Committee. I applied to the Inspectors to report as to the prisons which they thought could be so dealt with, and they have furnished me with a list of prisons which I have included in the schedule for abolition. I may say, however, that since then I have received representations from various local authorities which are well entitled to consideration, and in some cases those representations have been accompanied by promises that the prisons should undergo the necessary alterations. These representations have been referred to the Inspectors. As to the particular gaols which shall be thus dealt with, that is a question which we can dispose of in Committee, when the House will have fuller information before it.

The only remaining question to which the Lords' Committee directed their attention was one of great importance, namely, diet. Upon that point they made no recommendation beyond suggesting that a Commission should be appointed to inquire into the subject, and laying down the general principles in which all of us will agree, that the dietary of prisoners, while it should be such as not to injure health, should not be of a nature to contrast favourably with the ordinary diet of a labourer outside the prison. The House will see, from the papers before them, that a Committee of medical men was appointed, which made a Report proposing a new scale of dietaries with a maximum and a minimum. A copy of that Report was sent to each clerk of the peace and to other officers, in order that it might be brought under the notice of the local authorities, with a view to the adoption of the dietary suggested. Therefore, the question of diet forms no part of this Bill. There is only one other point, and that a minor one, to which I need refer. That is the question as to the abolition of Abingdon Gaol, which was recommended by the Court of Quarter Sessions. I have, however, ascertained that considerable difference of opinion exists upon that subject; and as it is a purely local question, it cannot well be decided without further information being afforded to the House. I have inserted that gaol in the Bill, but when we go into Committee I shall be guided by what shall appear to be the feeling of the county of Berks; and if good reasons be assigned for the retention of the gaol, I shall not object. Having thus briefly referred to all the points connected with this Bill upon which I think it is necessary at present to touch, I venture to hope that the House will now read it a second time, and that, after the explanation I have given, the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) will not press his Amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir George Grey.)

MR. ADDERLEY said, that after listening to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he should not think it necessary to move the Amendment of which he had given notice, but he felt there was still an important point at issue between them. The right hon. Baronet proposed to confer upon the Secretary of State powers which he (Mr. Adderley) thought ought to be defined by Act of Parliament. There would be no difference of opinion on the title of the right hon. Baronet certainly to the thanks of the House for introducing the Bill, because some reform in prison discipline had become absolutely necessary, and was the more imperative now that they had been dealing with the higher branches of the secondary penal code. It would be monstrous to reform the system of penal servitude while prison discipline, which formed the base of the system, was left untouched. As the right hon. Gentleman had said—one great object of reforming the law relating to prison discipline was to arrive at something like an uniform system. Such was the object of the Acts of George IV. and William IV. So again the object of the Lords' Committee was, in the first place, to make imprisonment more feared; and next, to make the system uniform. So important did he consider uniformity of system to be, that for himself he would prefer a worse system that was uniform to a better system which was of uncertain application throughout the country. The principal objection to the Bill was, that it did not provide sufficiently for insuring uniformity; and even the attempt that was made in it to gain that end was based upon a wrong principle, by leaving sentences to be carried out to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State instead of defining them by Act of Parliament. That was quite a new principle, which he believed would be productive of the worst species of centralization. Secretaries of State were changed, and they were not always men having the same views; besides which it was almost impossible for any Secretary of State to have sufficient knowledge of the circumstances of every case to enable him to judge accurately whether punishments were satisfactorily administered. But he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman against himself. The right hon. Baronet had from first to last told the House that he proposed to carry out the recommendations of the Lords' Committee. Early in the present Session the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) asked what steps would be taken in consequence of the Report of the Lords' Committee, and the Home Secretary then said that as far as the recommendations of the Committee could be carried out without an Act of Parliament, he had given instructions that they should be at once carried out, and that in respect of those matters which required legislation he was preparing a Bill, but should postpone its introduction until he received certain further information which might enable him to fulfil the Committee's requirements. But now it appeared that a Bill based upon the Report of the Lords' Committee would not in reality carry out any of their recommendations, except one of minor importance referring to the suppression of certain small borough prisons. The recommendations in respect of increased severity were few, but upon the point of uniformity the recommendations were numerous, precise, and important. The Committee wanted to obtain uniformity in the construction of prisons, in the punishment and treatment of prisoners, in the rules of the gaols, and in the classifications of prisoners. The Bill did not deal with these points. First, as to the construction of prisons, upon which the recommendations of the Committee were precise. The right hon. Baronet excused the Bill for doing nothing, and said they had not borne in mind how much had been done already in this respect. It was true that much had been done, but a long time had been occupied in doing it, and much remained to be done. The Act of Parliament for the erection of Pentonville Prison was passed twenty-two years ago. That prison was to be an experiment which, if successful, was to be followed out in all other places. The experiment had been successful, but it had not been followed out. If any good result had attended the introduction of the system the country generally had not reaped full advantage from it, for there were still no less than thirty of the most important gaols in England where it had not yet been introduced. At present the system was extending slowly, and what he and the Lords' Committee proposed was that its introduction should be expedited and rendered compulsory. That proposition was not a very violent one, because it could be effected at a small expense, and by no means necessitated a reconstruction of the present gaols, as some imagined. The House ought not to listen to local objections against the separate system, because the object was a national one. The system was not efficient unless made uniform. Any gaol of any size which refused to carry out the system was injuring the prison discipline and the beneficial effects of confinement throughout the country, because such a refusal would only tend to foster in the minds of criminals that speculation on uncertainty and that gambling in crime which tended to paralyze the power of all law. The next recommendation of the Commissioners was that the term "hard labour" should be defined in the Acts of Parliament. The desirability of such definition would hardly, he believed, be contested by any one. At present the term was so vague that it might mean anything on earth. Any person reading the evidence of the Committee would see at once that the value attached to the term depended upon the locality where the sentence was carried out. In one gaol it meant severe labour at the tread-wheel, the crank, or shot-drill; in another it was defined as school instruction and the employment of moral influence; while in the county of Berkshire a prisoner confined in the Reading Gaol would find that it signified no labour at all. Such a statement appeared to be almost incredible, but according to the evidence of Mr. Merry, nothing in the opinion of the magistrates of Berkshire was so irksome to a prisoner as confinement without employment; and, therefore, they construed hard labour to mean doing nothing at all. That state of things he did not believe the House could wish to continue. The right hon. Gentleman sought a remedy in the third clause of the Bill, which provided for the withholding of the whole of the Government allowance from any prison which had not received a certificate showing that adequate means were provided for carrying out sentences of hard labour, and that such sentences had been carried out in accordance with what the Secretary of State regarded as fulfilling the requirements of the law. If the angel Gabriel were Secretary of State, and his two Inspectors were Arguses, the clause could not be properly enforced. It would be impossible for the Inspectors to travel about the country with such rapidity and examine the prisons with so narrow a scrutiny as to render the clause effective, and a most arbitrary distribution of the certificates would necessarily be the result. But, independent of that objection, there still existed the uncertainty as to the nature of hard labour. The definition would be in the discretion of the Secretary of State, and his view of the question might coincide with that of the Reading magistrates, who believed entire idleness to be the hardest labour; or with that of the Winchester bench, who regarded the tread-wheel as the most irksome employment that could be given to a prisoner. Nothing would lead to a uniformity of hard labour short of its definition by Act of Parliament. The Lords' Committee had proposed as a definition—the tread-wheel, crank, or shot-drill, and he would suggest the addition of the words "and such like labour," an addition which would give some discretion, limited, it was true, but sufficient for the purpose of uniformity. He was quite aware that magistrates held their own theories as to the nature of hard labour, but he felt certain that they would be willing to abandon to this extent their own individual schemes if by so doing they could procure a great advance in uniformity. Another great object of the Committee was to secure a general scale of diet. The regulations on the subject of dietary at present varied in the different prisons in a most extraordinary degree. In the single article of bread, for instance, the variation ranged from 30 ounces to 234 ounces—a variation which reduced the whole system to an absurdity. He believed that a maximum and a minimum scale of dietary should be introduced into the Bill, because uniformity of diet and uniformity of hard labour, to be effective, should go hand in hand. Hard labour of any kind was hard or light in some degree according to the diet on which it was performed. Now, with regard to the exceptions. The right hon. Gentleman said that it would not be possible to lay down the same dietary for men and for women. That was a difficulty which he did not believe would be felt insuperable by any one, nor would it be desirable to include invalids in the general scale. There must always be a double system for the two sexes of convicts, and the regulation of the diet of invalids must always be discretionary, and all subject, of course, in a measure to the report of the surgeon in every case. There was also, at present, an entire want of conformity to rules; and although the 5 & 6 Will. IV. prescribed that the rules should undergo the revision of the Secretary of State, in a considerable number of gaols there were no rules at all, and some rules contained every possible absurdity that could come into the head of the wildest theorist. In his own county, Major Fulford, one of the highest authorities upon the subject, drew up certain rules, based on the Commissioners' Report, which, with some slight modifications, would probably do for all the gaols in the kingdom. The classification recommended by the Lords' Committee, and since carried out in Winchester Gaol, consisted in successive stages of treatment, through which every prisoner sentenced to a long term was to progress. In the existing Acts there is another kind of classification specified—namely, classes of prisoners, rendered needless by individual separation. The classification now recommended was one of treatment. If the prisoners were guilty of prison offences, they were to be degraded and thrown back into a worse stage, and the system of marks was avoided. The mark system was very arbitrary and unsatisfactory, and depended upon conduct which might be assumed by the worst hypocrite in the gaol. Even the greatest amount of work was a bad ground for alleviation of punishment, as it attached the highest privilege to the strongest villain. It was a system, too, in respect of which they had to depend on the reports of inferior officers, who should not be under temptation to make favorites, or who might want the courage and the judgment to make a true report, or the power to know really what report to make in every case. The Winchester system might be easily extended if only magistrates were willing to give up pet theories for the sake of uniformity; and if uniformity in classification of treatment could be arrived at the rest would be comparatively easy. The right hon. Gentleman had held out such a prospect of an amicable discussion of these points in Committee, and had expressed such readiness to adopt suggestions, that he thought they might consent to the second reading, and having made these criticisms he should offer no further opposition upon that stage of the Bill.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE said, it was felt throughout the country that the existing law provided amply for contingencies, and that the enactment of the fourth clause might cover very serious mischief. If, however, it was understood that the arbitrary power sought to be exercised by the right hon. Gentleman were not to be insisted on, however, he was not indisposed to go into Committee on the Bill.

MR. NEWDEGATE*: I so thoroughly concur with my right hon. Friend the Member for North Staffordshire in all the objections he has stated against this Bill that I regret he has withdrawn his Resolution, because I agree with him when he says—

"That no legislation to amend the present law relating to gaols can be satisfactory which does not include some definition of hard labour, and a schedule of rules for gaols; and which does not provide that all gaols shall be gradually adapted to the separate system, and for a uniform and classified treatment of all prisoners."

But my objections to the Bill go far beyond those of my right hon. Friend; and I think the House must be of opinion, from the petitions which have been presented, that all the objections felt through the country to the Bill are not comprised in those which were stated in the Resolution of my right hon. Friend. I have myself to-day presented a petition from the bench of justices for Westminster and Middlesex, in which it is stated that the attempt made by this Bill entirely to supersede their discretion with regard to the rules for the regulation of the gaols for which they are responsible is totally unprecedented. They say that it is altogether unprecedented that the Secretary of State or any other Officer of the Crown should be empowered to make contracts in the name of the justices, or that powers so vast should be proposed by this Bill that he might do anything almost that may please him as to the enforcement of rules in reference to the gaols; that he may declare any standard of adequacy, as it is called, necessary for his certificate of any gaol, and thereby may entail an unknown amount of expense upon the ratepayers, using the justices as tools to levy this taxation without the slightest discretion on their part as to the amount to be levied or the mode in which the money when obtained is to be expended. And remember, Sir, this does not touch the county magistrates only. The county magistrates have the regulation of the gaols for the counties. They have power to frame regulations for the government of those gaols in accordance with the rules framed by themselves, which are submitted to the Secretary of State for his approval.

It is quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman has stated, that the Secretary of State may proceed to alter or add to these rules. That is the state of the existing law; but the right hon. Gentleman has never told the House that which appears most distinctly in the evidence of Mr. Perry, the Inspector of Prisons for the northern half of England—namely, that there is no effectual power to enforce the alterations of the Prison Rules made by, no power to enforce the rules that may be suggested by, the Secretary of State, if the bench of magistrates be opposed to them. And, what is more, there is no case which came to the memory of either of the Inspectors of Prisons for England—and there are two, Mr. Perry and Mr. Vowles—in which an attempt has been made by any Secretary of State to force, by legal process upon an unwilling bench, rules of his own construction, or alteration of their rules which he may have suggested. It is perfectly true that the Secretary of State has consulted with different benches of magistrates, who have come to an agreement with him, and generally had the good sense to adopt his suggestions; but there is no power to compel them to adopt those suggestions. It is quite true that it would be possible for the Secretary of State to proceed by indictment, or by mandamus in the Court of Queen's Bench; but there is no proof of any Secretary of State having done so at any time. When, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman tells the House that he is about to take no additional powers by the Bill, I reply that he seeks large additional powers. But he does more; he also seeks the power of enforcing by penalty, on the justices, an enormous expenditure to be levied upon their responsibility from the ratepayers. Why, Sir, this is a direct means of taxation on one class of property at the will of the Secretary of State; and it is this consideration which has induced the Justices of the Peace of Westminster and of Middlesex to petition this House that the Bill may not pass into a law. Sir, I have never known an instance of a measure which bears examination so badly as this. Many hon. Members came to me and said that the Bill contains no additional power. Well, I did not like to act on my own opinion alone; so I prepared a case and submitted the following questions, not to one, but to three gentlemen learned in the law, and with the permission of the House—for I do not think I can show what is the real character of the Bill better

—I will read the questions put to and the answers received from one of these gentlemen—

"Does not Clause 2 make this Bill applicable to all gaols, except the thirty-one gaols specified in this Bill as to be discontinued, and the Government convict prisons?—Yes.

"Whereas, the whole discretion vested in the justices under the Prison Ministers' Act of last Session, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 79, must, if exercised, be brought into operation by rules. With respect to the appointment of Roman Catholic or other Dissenting ministers, or their being permitted to visit prisoners in gaol, would it not be competent to the Home Secretary, if this Bill becomes law, to make rules for the appointment of such ministers, or for permitting them to visit in any of, or all, the gaols to which this Bill is intended to apply?—Yes.

"Would it not be competent to the Home Secretary, under Clause 5, to compel the construction of, or appropriation of, a Roman Catholic chapel in any gaol now in existence or to be constructed, except the thirty-one gaols specified in this Bill, if he should think fit to declare such gaol inadequate without such chapel?—Yes.

"Might not the Home Secretary remove all the Roman Catholic or Nonconformist prisoners from any gaol in which there is not a chapel or a minister of their denomination appointed, to some gaol in which there is a chapel and a minister or ministers of their denomination appointed?—Yes, and make the county pay the expense of removal and maintenance."

The right hon. Gentleman felt the weakness of his own case when he offered to give up the 4th clause of the Bill. I beg the House, however, to observe that that clause is merely declaratory, the penalties are contained in the remainder of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that the whole of the powers which he proposes to take under this clause exist under the present law. The mere sweeping away of this declaratory clause would not remove the penalties or limit the discretionary power which the clause declares. But the right hon. Gentleman, if this Bill were to pass, would be able to enforce the existing law by the penalties which the Bill would enact. I most heartily wish for some judiciously framed measure upon this subject. It is now twenty-two years since any code of rules was issued for the regulation of gaols, and those twenty-two years have been most eventful in the matter of secondary punishments. I am only repeating the testimony of the late lamented Sir Joshua Jebb, and the evidence of Mr. Perry and Mr. Vowles, when I state that a code of rules applicable to present circumstances, such as were embodied in the Act of 1823 for the Regulation of Gaols, should be comprised in a schedule appended to any Bill of this kind, for the purpose of producing some uniformity of punishment in the gaols throughout the kingdom which are under the control of the justices. But, Sir, I beg to call the attention of the House to the recommendations of the Committee of the House of Lords in this respect: the Lords' Committee have, in their Report, declared most emphatically that not only should rules be issued, but that rules should be enacted. I most cordially concur in the propriety of that recommendation. No hon. Member, I believe, will dispute the competency of the Lords' Committee. They state in page 14 of their Report on Prison Discipline—

"1. It is obvious that to secure an efficient discipline every gaol must have a definite code of rules under which it is governed."

It is, indeed, clear that this was the intention of the Legislature, the 5 & 6 Will. IV. contemplates the existence of certain regulations in every prison, and with that view a code of rules has been issued by the Secretary of State for the information and adoption of the local authorities. But as their acceptance is left to the discretion of the local authorities, a comparatively small number of gaols in England and Wales have adopted the rules as framed by the Secretary of State. In some prisons neither the rules as laid down by the Secretary of State, nor any other rules framed by the governing body, and approved by him, are in existence; and in the remaining gaols the regulations vary indefinitely according to the views of the governing body. It is, indeed, quite true that it is within the competency of the Secretary of State, under 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 38, s. 6, in default of the framing of the regulations by the local authorities, to certify such rules as he shall deem necessary for the government of any prison, which shall then become binding. It appears, however, that this power has never been exercised by the Secretary of State.

"2. The Committee are of opinion that such rules for gaols as may be thought advisable should be embodied as a schedule in an Act of Parliament, and that the Treasury allowance should be withheld from all gaols where those rules are not in force."

My complaint against this Bill, and it would be the complaint of the House of Lords, is that whereas they recommend that rules should be enacted by Parliament, this Bill contains no rules. Now, the advantage of having definite rules is this: that the rules at once instruct the magistrates and bind the Home Secretary. But this Bill gives the right hon. Gentleman the power of making rules without the slightest previous knowledge on the part of this House, the justices, or the public, of what those rules will be. The Bill would also confer upon him a most effectual power to enforce these unknown rules. Surely there remains in the House of Commons some respect for the old form of government, in accordance with which the local affairs of the counties, cities, and boroughs have hitherto been managed; some respect for those who give their time, sometimes most valuable time, for the accomplishment of this important object. All that the justices seek in proposing the rejection of this Bill is, that the House will define the width of the discretion, and the extent of the power to be exercised; that they may be instructed specifically how they are to improve the discipline of the gaols over which they preside. They ask for instructions, but they deprecate the arming of any central authority with the power of overriding their discretion to any extent, and of compelling them to become the instruments of a taxation which they justly term "unconstitutional" in its nature, because it is not defined by Parliament either in its amount or objects, and is to be levied directly at the instance of an Officer of the Crown. It is for these reasons that I have given notice that I should move the rejection of the Bill. Far be it from me to suggest a code of rules of so stringent and narrow a character that they would be applicable only to gaols built upon the Pentonville model. Sir Joshua Jebb, and the two prison Inspectors for England, declare that there ought to be several classes of rules, and that each class of rules should be applicable to a certain class of prisons. Thus a process would be established of obtaining uniformity by means not so arbitrary as a narrow definition, applicable only to one class of gaols, but enabling the justices to feel that they have the sanction of law in conforming to the rules which the information at the command of the House and the Government ought to enable them to frame for their guidance. The question under consideration is no trifling matter. The right hon. Gentleman proposes that we should change the law. So far as he is concerned, the House might have confidence in him personally whilst he is in office; but he asks us to arm all his successors, every Secretary of State, we know not whom, with an indefinite power of overriding the discretion of the justices in counties, cities, and boroughs, and compelling the county justices and the town councils to levy any amount of money that the Secretary of State for the time being may think proper, and to enforce contracts not made in his own name and upon their responsibility. Is it surprising that there should be a feeling prevalent throughout the country that such indefinite powers as these ought not to be given? I think I have shown, then, that there is one class of objectors to the Bill whose objections, however lightly they may have been treated by the right hon. Gentleman, ought not to be overlooked by the House—I mean those of the local authorities, the county justices, the borough magistrates, and the town councils. The right hon. Gentleman also spoke lightly of another class of objectors. He said that there were certain persons who, upon religious grounds, object to the existing Prison Ministers Act. Sir, those persons object to that Act, not only upon religious grounds, but upon the grounds of policy. For, remember, Rome is not merely the centre of a religious, but of a political organization, and I would that hon. Members of the House would open their eyes to the extent of this influence. The strong Government of France is resisting the Ultramontane organization. It has ruined Poland, and our ancestors had to eject it from this country, or it might have ruined us. The agents of this politico-religious organization are making it very fashionable in this country. If any one says there is danger in this quarter, he is told, “there is nothing so unfashionable,” or, “that it is an antiquated prejudice to entertain such apprehensions; that it is delightful to witness such an organization spreading throughout the country for purely charitable purposes.” We hear of bazaars taking place supported by persons of the greatest weight and influence in society, and of all sorts of exertions to strengthen this organization. I wish hon. Members would turn back a little to the history of their own country, and not shut their eyes to the effects of this organization, not only upon the religion, but upon the peace, the social happiness, and the freedom of the nations of the world. I was inclined to doubt whether I was not carried away by prejudice in thinking that this Bill might be used to contravene the discretion vested in the justices by the Prison Ministers Act of last Session with respect to the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains, and Roman Catholic priests being permitted to visit prisoners in the gaols of this country. But I am relieved from that apprehension when I find the Tablet, which is an Ultramontane paper, supporting the Bill, and that the Weekly Register, another Ultramontane paper, adopts the same course. If the House will permit me, I will read to it a few extracts from the Weekly Register of the 28th of May—

“Sir George Grey’s Prison Bill is threatened with fierce opposition. The Government, seeing the futility of expecting that the Protestant magistracy of the country will surrender their prejudices and voluntarily appoint Catholic chaplains to administer spiritual instruction to Catholic prisoners in the gaols under their jurisdiction, have availed themselves of a Bill which they found it necessary to bring into Parliament for the abolition of certain prisons and the re-organization of others, to introduce a clause giving the Secretary of State power to order absolutely the appointment of Catholic chaplains in those prisons where the circumstances shall appear to him to warrant such a step.”

Now, this may be said to be only anonymous writing; but as a magistrate for Middlesex and for Westminster, I happened to know that the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department has been urging the visiting magistrates of the gaols in Westminster and Middlesex to admit Roman Catholic priests to those gaols under the 3rd Section of the Prison Ministers Act, and to do this in direct violation of a resolution passed by the Court of Quarter Sessions. My brother magistrates, finding that the right hon. Gentleman was using his influence for this purpose, they began to look closely into the present Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman was evidently engaged in an attempt to raise our visiting justices, our committee, in revolt against the resolution of the Court of Quarter Session, under the terms of the Prison Ministers Act, which he thought would cover the operation; if the Secretary of State was to obtain such enormous powers as he asks by this Bill, those powers might be used to punish the court, by compelling us to levy additional taxation upon the ratepayers. What a position we should then be in! If we did not levy money to accomplish the purposes of the Secretary of State, we should be placed in a false position with the ratepayers; because the right hon. Gentleman might withhold the Government allowance for the maintenance of the prisoners, and then we should be in the position of having to tax the ratepayers of the county the more as a penance for not having complied with his demands. Supposing he were to say, "I insist upon a Roman Catholic chapel being built in one of the prisons," and the justices were to refuse. He might at once declare that prison inadequate; and when he has done that, of course he would withhold the Government allowance, and we should have to levy the difference upon the ratepayers. Surely these are not unreasonable objections. Then this Ultramontane paper goes on to say—

"With these fanatics and hypocrites religious liberty means the right of going wrong in spiritual matters, and the power of tormenting those who repudiate such a right. Catholics hold to dogma in religious matters, and the Evangelical Protestantism would enforce its own principle of the right of every man to think as he pleases upon religious subjects."

It then proceeds in the same strain, with respect to the Prison Ministers Act—

"As Protestantism is based upon the right of private judgment in matters spiritual, the Government and the Parliament, consisting mostly of Protestants, concluded, naturally enough, that in this Protestant country the benefit of the great Protestant principle would be freely extended to non-Protestants, and that Protestant magistrates and guardians would cheerfully take the requisite steps for the religious instruction of Catholics in prisons and workhouses, notwithstanding the maintenance of the opposite principle by all members of the Catholic Church. Unfortunately, their confidence was lamentably misplaced."

Now, that is not an unfair representation of the opinion of the House. I am happy to say, however, we may be mistaken; and the Prison Ministers Act, to a certain extent, admits the principle of religious liberty, and that is the principle which this paper condemns. With the permission of the House, I will read a few more words from the same paper—

"The permissive character of the Prison Ministers Bill is traceable to a far different source. Sir George Grey was apprehensive of arousing Protestant bigotry and intolerance by a compulsory measure, and he tried to coax the 'great unpaid' into a liberal and generous course. He has failed egregiously, as we foresaw from the beginning, for the Parliament is far more liberal than the nation; and the deeper we descend into the substratum of English society, the more copiously do we discover the existence of intense bigotry and intolerance. The Clerkenwell magistrates and the Chelsea Guardians are animated by the like spirit—intense hatred of the Catholic Church; and as the same feeling, though, perhaps, less virulently, pervades the mass of English Protestantism, especially amongst the country squires and the middle and lower classes, both Government and Parliament must at once make up their minds either to leave groes and admitted injustice unredressed and unrectified, or to make their remedies compulsory as regards both prisons and workhouses."

Such is the language that I find in this Ultramontane organ. It then gives an instance of how in Liverpool the guardians have declared that a Roman Catholic chaplain should attend the poor in the workhouse, and selected three priests for the purpose, but restricting them to the rule that one only should be allowed to attend at a time. But these priests declare that no such "paltry admission" as this will satisfy them, and they say—thus writes the Weekly Register—

"Under the Act of Parliament, if there were sixty Catholic paupers in the Liverpool workhouse, and as many Catholic clergymen in the borough, there is no authority in the Poor Law officials to prevent the visit of the whole of those sixty priests to the institution at the same time and at all hours of the day every day of the year."

Sir, that only shows the extent of the demands which we may expect to see urged from that quarter. This demand was urged by the improperly styled (Roman) Catholic Bishop of Liverpool. And has further consideration altered the opinion which this Ultramontanist organ represents with respect to this Bill? Why, in the Weekly Register of Saturday last, I find this statement—

"Sir George Grey has fixed Monday next for the second reading of the Gaols Bill, and as the evangelical bigots in London and throughout the country are straining every nerve to defeat the measure, merely because it empowers the Government to order provision to be made for the spiritual instruction of Catholic prisoners, it is of the last importance that the Irish Members—[let the House observe that it is an English Bill]—who represent Catholic constituencies, should be at their post to support the Home Secretary."

We all know very well what is understood by the phrase "spiritual instruction." It means the supervision of a priest exercised over a prisoner in a separate cell, whether the prisoner desires that supervision or not. By the Prison Ministers Act the priest would not be admitted by the free request or by the voluntary act of the prisoner; but whether the prisoner will or not, he would be subjected to the direct control of a priest to be admitted to the cell in which the unhappy man is confined. Entertaining the deep love of religious freedom and the right of private judgment which this Ultramontane organ says pervades, not only this House, but the country, from the upper through the middle classes down to the lowest stratum of society, I deprecate the passing of any measure which might place the Home Secretary in the position of being tempted to violate at once the spirit of our legislation and the religious feelings of the people, by enabling this Ultramontane faction to exercise the greatest moral tyranny through their priests over these helpless persons who, owing to their unfortunate position, could not escape from this spiritual thralldom. We have heard a great deal about the advantages to prison discipline which will be likely to accrue from the appointment of Roman Catholic priests as gaol chaplains. Sir, I hold in my hand the copy of a letter written by a person of the name of Thwaites, in which he says it was his misfortune to have spent nearly ten years as first schoolmaster in the English convict prisons, and that whilst thus employed he had ample opportunities of testing the value of the services of the Roman Catholic chaplains among the convicts of that persuasion. He declares that he speaks from personal knowledge, for he has had to do with 17,000 convicts, and that those who were under the direct control of Roman Catholic chaplains, and were the best thought of by them, were in several instances implicated in those violences and outbreaks which, I am sorry to say, have marked the recent history of our convict prisons. He also declares emphatically that he believes it can be proved, by documents which are in the possession of the Home Office, that the power exercised by these Roman Catholic chaplains has conduced neither to preserve order and discipline, nor to improve the prisoners; but that this one marked fact remains, that the most violent of those who have been concerned in these outbreaks were the very men who had accepted the most willingly the tuition of the Roman Catholic chaplains. And this is only consistent with that which we have heard respecting the outbreaks at the Reformatory of Mount St. Bernard in Leicestershire. I am sorry to say that I have, moreover, heard that the Roman Catholic chaplain at Parkhurst, having been informed that some of the assistants of the matron possessed Protestant books—these persons being Protestants themselves—immediately went to the Governor of the gaol, by whom, on the representations of this priest, an order was issued that these books must be given up, although it could not be proved that they had been used among the prisoners. Thus you have a direct interference on the part of a Roman Catholic chaplain with the religious freedom of the gaol officials. And why? Because it seems that one of the attendants of the matron had been converted to Popery, and it was through her means that the priest came to the knowledge that these books were in the possession of her Protestant fellow-servants. I am sorry to hear these reports, but they seem to me to be a sufficient answer to those reflections which are sometimes cast upon my brother magistrates, because they have proceeded with great caution in carrying out the provisions of the Prison Ministers Act. Ample evidence might be adduced to show that the manner in which the justices and borough magistrates have used the discretion which is vested in them by that Act affords no ground and no reason why this House should be induced to sanction any arbitrary interference with their discretion. The principle of this Bill is exactly the opposite of the Prison Ministers Act. The Prison Ministers Act vested a discretion in the magistrates; the chief purpose of this Bill is to coerce that discretion. It is quite true that it is indirectly that the operation of this Bill upon the appointment of Roman Catholic priests or Nonconformist ministers would be brought to bear, but that operation would be none the less effectual. I was not fully aware of this intention until I read the correspondence which was carried on by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary with the visiting justices of Middlesex. The whole tenor of the Bill is to supersede, by the authority of the Secretary of State, the discretion which has been vested in the justices, in the magistrates, in the town councils, in the local authorities of this country, with respect to the prisons under their charge. I am very far from saying that all our prisons are what they ought to be. I am far from wishing the House for one moment to suppose that I overlook the fact that transportation has been practically abandoned, or reduced to so small a practice as not to be worth consideration. I do not wish to overlook that fact, but what does that fact entail? Why, an enormous expenditure, in order to provide for the accumulation of convicts in this country. If our prison discipline is to be what it ought to be, gaols must be constructed to carry it out; and the construction of those gaols will involve a vast expenditure if they are to be conducted upon the Pentonville system, and even a still greater expenditure if the separate system is to be enforced with due regard to the health and sanity of the prisoners; for the evidence is conclusive that there is great danger in that system if it be carelessly administered. This brings back to my mind the substance of a conversation which I had with the late Sir Benjamin Brodie on this subject. He said—

"It was through my intervention that the prison dietary of Pentonville was improved, that the prisoners now receive a dietary which seems to some persons to be so extraordinary. I did this," he went on to say, "by threatening to resign unless the dietary was improved; for I found that the minds of the prisoners were sinking under the debility of their bodies, and that the punishment practically inflicted was so severe that their sanity failed under the system."

Whilst speaking upon this subject, let me recall the attention of the House to this particular danger. I have witnessed dreadful results from the abuse of the separate system in the United States of America. I saw such a scene in the prison of Philadelphia as I shall never forget to the latest hour of my existence. There I saw men in every stage of mental and physical decomposition under the operation of the separate system carried out in an exaggerated form, and the House will forgive me if I quote a passage from a letter written by the President of Bethlehem Hospital to Lord Westminster on this very question. The president says—

"My attention has been forced to the results of the system of separate imprisonment. As president of Bethlehem Hospital I have been compelled to hear the warrants of the Secretary of State read for the admission to that lunatic hospital of the victims of the separate system sent from the two Government prisons—the Millbank Penitentiary and the Pentonville prison. The noble Marquess is doubtless unaware that during the last ten years no fewer than forty lunatics have been sent from the Penitentiary to Bethlehem, while in the preceding ten years only fourteen were so sent; and are the public expected to believe that this fearful increase is not the direct result of the separate system?"

SIR GEORGE GREY: What is the date of that letter?

MR. NEWDEGATE: It was written in 1847, and my attention was first directed to it by the late Duke of Richmond, one of the Commissioners for the management of the Pentonville experiment. The right hon. Gentleman was himself one of the Commissioners, and, highly to his honour, concurred with Sir Benjamin Brodie and the other Commissioners in the necessity for raising the prison dietary up to a high scale, because it was found that the prisoners could not bear separate confinement on a low dietary. The right hon. Gentleman deserves all honour for the part he took in effecting that improvement; but it is as well to mention this now, because it is proposed by the Bill before us that we should enforce this system—greatly improved I admit, and certainly better understood now than formerly, but still this very system—in all the gaols of England. I pray the House not to give the power to whomsoever may be the Home Secretary hereafter to enforce this system without laying down rules that shall limit its application and guard it from the cruelty with which it might be applied through ignorance, through want of information, or through insufficient attendance. If the House resolves to arm the Secretary of State with this power to enforce the separate system of prison discipline throughout the county and borough gaols, the House is bound to enforce on the magistrates the duty of providing an adequate staff of officials, and to make provision for the expenses that may be necessarily incurred by direct and specific enactment. I trust the House will forgive me for having trespassed so long upon its attention. I have watched these experiments now for more than twenty years, and I rejoice to say that experience has mitigated the dangers of the application of the separate system; but if you are about to enforce that system upon unwilling and reluctant authorities, let me pray the House to define what shall be enforced, and to make the justices really responsible. Under this Bill, as it stands, there will be no real, direct, tangible responsibility. The Secretary of State will issue some unknown orders to the magistrates; the magistrates will comply; the ratepayers will complain, something will go wrong. Then the question will arise, "Whose fault is it?" Under such a vague power as is here created, you will have nothing, in fact, but the responsibility of the Secretary of State for the Home Department; and the House knows that so various are the functions of the Secretary of State, that he is practically exempted from that direct responsibility which ought to attach to those who have in their keeping the bodies, the minds, the health, the sanity of the prisoners who are placed under their control. You will have no direct responsibility under this Bill; and it is for that reason, amongst others which I have enumerated, that I venture now to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day three months, not because I do not desire that a Bill for the regulation of our gaols should pass, but because this Bill violates the great principle of local self-government, because it violates the principles of the Constitution as to taxation, and fails in this—that it affords no specific directions, prescribes no adequate limitations, because it provides no adequate security, and entails no adequate responsibility to guard the application of the power it would bring into operation; because, in short, the Bill is too vague to become a safe instrument for securing the advantages, which I am confident it is the desire of the House to confer upon the country.

Mr. BARROW said, he rose to second the Amendment. At the same time, he rested his opposition to the Bill on different grounds from those which characterized the arguments of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. He (Mr. Barrow) objected to the Bill because he was opposed to the principle of centralization of authority in this country. He considered there was already quite enough of departmental despotism. The Bill would place the local authorities, as far as regarded the gaols, in a different position altogether to what they stood in at present. If the visiting justices, for example, made an inadequate provision as regarded the dietary of the gaol, the prisoners would have some chances of obtaining a remedy for their grievances by appealing in counties to the justices. The provisions of the existing Act clearly showed that this remedy was intended to be given them by the Legislature. The right hon. Gentleman, it was true, had proposed to make improvements in the prison rules, but the existing law already authorizes him to do so by enabling him to revise and alter any rules submitted to him by the visiting justices, and the failure to exercise this power hitherto does not furnish a sufficient reason for depriving the visiting justices of all voice in the matter. It was the duty of the Secretary of State, as part of the executive Government, to see that the law was enforced; but the visiting justices also were a material part of the executive Government; and what he desired was that these two authorities should act in harmony with each other. He was most anxious that the discipline of the prisons should be enforced; and it was with regret that he noticed, upon examining the records of the gaols and the blue-books upon the subject, that re-commitments were greatly increasing. He was anxious that punishment should be both deterrent and reformatory, and he was convinced that a certain amount of hard labour was essential, both for the benefit of the prisoner and of society. With respect to the separate system, he wished to say that he was not in favour of extreme separation. In any prisons to be erected it was desirable so to construct them that a prisoner might be sent to his separate cell for the greater part of the day, and then let him have open-air exercise, with hard labour, for two hours. All medical men with whom he had conversed upon the subject declared that the most sanitary employment in a prison was open-air exercise. It tended to keep the prisoner in a better state of health as regarded the body, and put him in a fitter state of mind for receiving instruction and advice. He was anxious that an amount of hard labour more than was ordinarily inflicted in the prisons should be adopted. He entirely objected to those clauses of the Bill which gave despotic power to the Secretary of State, at whose mercy it would place the money of the ratepayers. At present the plans for additional buildings were considered by the local authorities, and submitted to the Secretary of State, who had a veto; but it was not often that any difference arose between the two. In the Bill, however, by a fiction of law (and he hated all fictions of law), a power had been introduced which would enable the Secretary of State to contract in the names of other parties, and make other parties liable to an indefinite extent. He could not imagine that either magistrates, ratepayers, or town councils would be willing to submit to such arbitrary provisions. If there was a difference of opinion between the local authorities and the Government, the question ought at least to be submitted to a judicial decision—as, for instance, that of a Judge of Assize. He was surprised to see that the Inspectors said that an Act of Parliament was necessary to enable any alteration to be made in the size of the cells and for separate confinement. The fact was, that the size of those cells was fixed by the authority of the Secretary of State, who might, if he pleased, alter it to-morrow. He believed that the percentage of improvement as to separate confinement was fully equal to what was stated by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, and he was convinced that it might be still further extended by concert between the local authorities and the Secretary of State, without any such Bill as that before the House.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was quite unable to support the Amendment which had been moved; and he confessed that the speech of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down rather impressed upon his mind the idea that he ought to be very desirous for the passing of a Bill of the character of that before them. The speech of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire seemed to him to be founded entirely upon the apprehension which he entertained with regard to the fourth clause, which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had already intimated his readiness to withdraw. He (Sir John Pakington) confessed that he had never been able to understand the strong objections which had been expressed by some hon. Members to that fourth clause; because, as he read it, it only enabled the Secretary of State to do at any time of the year that which he could now do only at a particular period. At any rate it appeared to him to be a matter not worth half-an-hour's discussion. He must say that he regarded the Bill as a most important one in the interests of this country; and he hoped the House would regard the question as one rather between honest men and rogues than as between Protestants and Roman Catholics. The Prison Ministers Bill appeared to him to have nothing at all to do with the subject before them. The fact was that many serious evils in the gaols had long existed and long been known; and they had been forced into unusual prominence by the very able Report presented by a Committee of the House of Lords upon the state of our prison discipline. A most dangerous and objectionable want of uniformity in the practice in various gaols had been found to exist. In not a few gaols, especially in the smaller towns and boroughs, a degree of laxity and negligence had prevailed which, combined with that want of uniformity, had seriously interfered with and impeded the administration of the criminal law. Under these circumstances, and in presence of that able Report to which he had referred, he thought the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) would have neglected his duty if he had not, during the Session, introduced a measure with the view of obviating these dangers and difficulties. He must also say, that it was a little hard upon the right hon. Gentleman that when he undertook to deal with the subject he was met with the cry of centralization. Nobody was less disposed than he (Sir John Pakington) to question the general efficiency and discretion with which the duties of the magistracy were exercised, and the advantage which resulted to the country; but it was possible that the magistrates might be intrusted with too extensive powers. Experience had shown that in regard to our gaols there was a greater amount of negligence and laxity of action than was consistent with the interests of the country. Entertaining these opinions, and considering that the question before the House that night was not as to the details of the Bill, but its principle, he could have no hesitation in declaring his intention to vote for the second reading. As regarded the purpose of the discussion that night, it turned upon the third, fourth, and fifth clauses. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) had already stated that he was prepared to withdraw the fourth. The third clause was one which he thought in its principle was extremely necessary. He would not pledge himself to all its provisions; but he thought the provisos introduced at the end went very far to disarm any objections or apprehensions which might be made or entertained. He would suggest that there was something rather inconvenient and unusual in the extraordinary length of the fifth clause, which was the longest he ever remembered to have seen in a Bill. It was indeed a small Bill of itself. From the tone in which the right hon. Gentleman had addressed the House, he was convinced that he would fairly consider any suggestions which might be made, and he took the liberty accordingly of pointing out with what advantage this clause might be divided into two, three, or even more. With regard to the observations of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley), he thought there was a great deal in them that was worthy of the consideration of the House. Regretting as he did that, having regard to the magnitude of the evils which the Bill was designed to correct, it was necessary to give larger powers to the Secretary of State than he had hitherto exercised; at the same time he quite agreed with his right hon. Friend that, so far as it was possible and safe to embody in an Act of Parliament the principle upon which our gaols were to be governed, it was desirable to do so. He confessed his disappointment with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) when he introduced the Bill, that he had not attempted any definition of hard labour, and still more that the right hon. Gentleman after reflection should have told them that evening, that although he had no objection to introduce any satisfactory definition that could be adopted, he believed it to be impossible. Now, he (Sir John Pakington) did not think that it was so impossible to define hard labour as was represented; and certainly the reasons given were not conclusive in favour of the right hon. Gentleman's opinion. It was quite true that it would be more difficult to deal upon this question with the cases of women than of men; but even supposing it were found impossible with regard to women, it by no means followed that they could not define hard labour for men whose sentences were more frequent, and for longer periods. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman, in the interval from the discussion to going into Committee, would take this point into his serious consideration, because it would be much safer to have hard labour defined than to have it in its present condition, the practice in no two cases being alike. In Worcester, what was called "hard labour" consisted in making mats in a comfortable cell. In his opinion that was not hard labour, and words ought to be introduced which would prevent any body of justices from putting such an interpretation on the sentence. The questions of diet and hard labour were very closely connected, and he put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether the passing of the measure would not be facilitated if he were to lay down a maximum and a minimum system of dietary, which might be apportioned to the hard labour. It might also be well if some leading rules for the governance of gaols could be laid down, but on that point he felt graver doubts than upon the others.

MR. WHALLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, instead of answering the arguments of the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment, had endeavoured to distract the attention of the House from the real point raised by that Amendment. The Bill professed to be founded on the Report emanating from the House of Lords. But what was the fact? Instead of embodying, as that Report recommended, such rules as were thought admissible in the schedule to an Act of Parliament, the right hon. Gentleman sought to obtain from Parliament power to make those rules himself. The Bill was not what it pretended to be, and was, therefore, a surprise upon Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman treated, with great indifference and contempt, what he was pleased to call religious objections, and pledged his personal assurance that there was nothing whatever to justify the apprehensions entertained. The right hon. Gentleman must know that the objections were not religious, but political in their character. These objections were levelled not at the Roman Catholic religion, but at a political organization in this country—an organization not of the laity but of the Roman Catholic priesthood which, in gaols, in workhouses, or in other institutions, and whether in England or in Ireland, was alike fatal to the independence and true interests of the country, and, moreover, opposed to all the warnings of history, and to the plain enactments on our own statute-book. In spite of the personal assurances of the right hon. Gentleman, apprehensions must continue whilst that active political enemy not only existed, but was subsidized in this country to an extent greater than appeared by the Estimates was patronized and petted by the present Government, and in an especial manner by the right hon. Gentleman himself. As had been shown by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, wherever the Roman Catholic priests went there were to be found the source of all sedition and difficulty. It was quite clear that the 5th clause was objectionable, and that to be properly understood it should be simplified; but as it stood it was perfectly clear that it was the desire of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to obtain the power of transferring prisoners of the Roman Catholic religion from prisons where the magistrates had refused to provide funds to other prisons where adequate provision had been made for their religious instruction; and no doubt it was intended to have in one or more prisons a regular Roman Catholic church service. He had before the introduction of the Bill come to the conclusion that it would be better to abstain from alluding to these religious questions in that House, and he should be content to abide by what he understood the wisdom of their ancestors had provided against such Acts as those to which the right hon. Gentleman desired to obtain the sanction of Parliament. The Act of 1829 provided that not one single Jesuit should remain in this country unregistered under the penalty of £20 a day, and yet by a Return presented to the House it appeared that there were now fifty-six monasteries and one hundred and thirty convents in this country. In the year 1862 the House, on his Motion, rejected a Bill somewhat similar to that passed last Session. As soon as Parliament was prorogued, however, the Home Secretary issued an order by which he had literally supplied the Roman Catholic priests with keys to the cells of the Roman Catholic prisoners, and had enabled those priests to thrust on them their ministrations; and that was done although the Return clearly showed that not 5 per cent of the prisoners desired the interposition of the priests. By the admirable provision of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, the opinion of three eminent counsel had been obtained, from which it appeared that the Home Secretary could send priests into the gaols whether required or not. The question was one of surprise and good faith. Why, then, was the clause so carelessly drawn as to admit of the doubt and justify the legal opinion in question? Would the House allow him to call attention to the action of the Home Secretary in the convict prison of Perth? [Sir GEORGE GREY: Perth is a Government prison.] A Roman Catholic female prisoner desired to be revisited by a Scripture reader. The priest complained, and the right hon. Gentleman not merely prohibited her from seeing the Scripture reader again, but issued a general order that no Scripture reader should be in future permitted to visit a Roman Catholic prisoner even at his or her own request. The danger as pointed out by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was, that under the 5th clause of the Bill the right hon. Gentleman could act in pretty much the same manner.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member had misunderstood him. The questions he had put turned on the effect of the whole Bill, and not on one particular portion of it.

MR. WHALLEY: One of the questions of the hon. Member was, whether the right hon. Gentleman under the Bill would not be enabled to transfer Roman Catholic prisoners who were denied ministrations of the Roman Catholic priests to gaols where the magistrates had no such scruples? Taking the context of the clauses he feared the right hon. Baronet desired to take powers of which he did not now disclose the purport. But he appealed from the Bill to the protection which he had under the Act of Settlement of 1688. He for one rejoiced that the Protestants of this country had a protection under that Act beyond the reach of the Bill, even although it might be passed into a law. They knew that Her Majesty held her position as Sovereign on condition not only of not being a Papist, but of not being reconciled to or recognizing the Pope of Rome. But what had the right hon. Gentleman done by the Bill of last Session, and what was he doing now? Why, he was making the Queen take upon herself through her nominees, the magistrates, to raise taxes from the counties for the payment of these Roman Catholic priests. If that construction were right the objectors to the Bill were not all of them those fanatics or "religious persons" they had been described. The Bill ought to be regarded with circumspection, for although the necessary abatement could be made in the case of statements of Roman Catholics who made the means subservient to the end, it behoved them to be cautious in receiving the statements of the right hon. Gentleman as to the real scope and ultimate object of the measure.

MR. MAGUIRE said, the question raised by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was the awful consequences which would result to Roman Catholic prisoners if the priests of their faith should be allowed to see them in prison. Now, he maintained that, as it was a right and proper thing that the Protestant chaplain should visit the Protestant prisoners, though they made no application to have him to see them, so it was equally right that the Catholic priest should see those prisoners who belonged to his communion, even though they might have expressed no wish to that effect. It was a fatal thing both to society and the prisoner himself to turn him out of prison unreformed, and he believed that if the religious influence were not brought to bear on prisoners, whether Protestant or Catholic, there was little chance of their conversion from crime. But was it or was it not a greater violation of the principles of religious liberty to force a Protestant chaplain upon a Protestant prisoner than to force the ministrations of a Catholic priest upon a Catholic prisoner? The hon. Member for North Warwickshire had never denounced the former as a violation of such principles. Was not the religious influence exercised by the Catholic priest upon a prisoner the same as that exercised by a Protestant chaplain? [Mr. NEWDEGATE: No!] He had not spoken with reference to doctrinal differences, nor was he going to enter into religious controversy in that House, but none but a fanatic could say that it was not for the benefit of the poor ignorant vicious Catholic prisoner that he should receive the ministrations of his priest. He would ask the right hon. Baronet to answer this question—whether the relaxation of the rule by which the ministrations of the Catholic priest was limited to those Catholics who asked for them had not been attended with the best possible consequences? [Mr. WHALLEY: That's a leading question.] From the information which had reached him he asserted that it had. Not very long since, he believed in the Millbank Prison, an unfortunate Irish Catholic prisoner became particularly hardened, and no one could control him. He attacked the governor and warders, and made such a savage onslaught upon one of the latter that he almost tore the warder's thumb off. That furious demon was taken in hand by the Rev. Mr. Oakley, the Catholic priest who was then visiting the prison, and the result was that in a short time he became under his ministrations one of the most docile of the prisoners. What danger could attend the visits of the Roman Catholic priest in England more than Ireland? In Ireland, if there were only five Protestants in prison they would have a Protestant chaplain, and Catholics did not object. On the contrary, they said it was quite right and just. But one hon. Gentleman in that House imagined that it was a regular Popish plot, and another that there was a combination of Jesuits and the Lord knows what, if the Catholic priest was allowed to visit, not Protestants or Presbyterians, but those of his own communion. If the Government found that any magistrates were so foolish as not to adopt the very best means of reforming the Roman Catholic prisoners under their jurisdiction, they ought to have the courage to bring in a Bill by which they might themselves have the power in every such case of neglect to appoint a Roman Catholic chaplain; and they ought also to take the sense of the House of Commons on the point.

MR. WALTER said, that it was not his intention to follow the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken into that particular part of the subject, which, in his opinion, had been somewhat needlessly imported into the discussion; but he rose to say a few words in reference to a gaol which had been twice prominently alluded to—he meant the principal gaol in the county which he had the honour to represent. He trusted he might be excused for saying that the case was not so bad as had been represented. The right hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley), and the hon. Member for South Nottinghamshire (Mr. Barrow), had stated that in Reading Gaol there was no work at all—that the principle of that gaol was that the prisoners should not work. That was not exactly the case. There was a crank there, and within the last twelve months considerable money had been spent in laying in a store of stones for the prisoners to break, though he believed that breaking stones was not called hard labour. Reading Gaol was one of the first model gaols in this country, and was built about twenty years ago, on the separate system. From all that he had seen, he was not disposed to give an unqualified adherence to the working of that system. Not only were the cells separate, but the chapel was so constructed that no prisoner in it could see another, as it was assumed that there would be great danger in prisoners knowing each other in gaol, lest they might meet again in after life. He thought that was rather riding the hobby too hard. Of course he was in favour of separate cells for sleeping and for occupation during the greater part of the day; but when the prisoners were at hard labour he did not see why they should not work in common, as at Portland and other Government prisons. He was, therefore, by no means disposed to recommend the system at Reading in an unqualified manner. He had noticed that the chaplains of that gaol had always urged on the magistrates the expediency of passing long sentences, for the mere purpose of reformation, which he considered unwise and contrary to the principles of criminal justice. The theory which those gentlemen wish to carry out was that of an exclusively reformatory plan. Now, he had very great doubts whether they could carry reformation to any very great extent in gaols, though, of course, they were bound to give the prisoners a chance; but to base the whole system of prison discipline on that theory was, he thought, mischievous, and likely to be unsuccessful. Therefore, he considered that prison discipline should be accompanied with a considerable amount of hard work. He quite agreed with his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, that it would not be wise to lay down any very strict definition of hard labour. The Select Committee found that it was much more easy to define what hard labour was not than what it was, and, if he recollected aright, they defined what it was not by saying that nothing should be considered as hard labour but what tended to raise the pulse and promote perspiration. He remembered reading of an Italian physician who cured a patient of the gout by setting him to dance on a hot floor, and, perhaps, if a prisoner at the treadmill had to step upon a hot metal plate, such an arrangement might be considered as coming within the definition of hard labour he had just referred to. These were matters, indeed, which ought to be left in the first instance to the magistrates themselves, subject to the control of the Home Secretary. He had not any fear of centralization, for if the Home Secretary abused his powers he would very soon hear of it in that House. That was a great security against abuse. With regard to the treatment of the prisoners, it would not do to deprive the magistrates of all discretion; but if Parliament laid down general rules founded on the experience of men who had studied the subject, then the matter should be left in the hands of the magistrates, subject to those general rules and to the control of the Home Office. He did not see that the Bill did more than that, and he was ready to give his vote in favour of the second reading.

MR. MITFORD said, he thought that a consolidation of the various statutes relating to prison discipline was desirable, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would direct his attention to that subject. He admitted that there was a good deal in the argument that the Bill was a step towards centralisation, yet when he knew that there were numerous prisons deficient in the means of giving hard labour to prisoners and in carrying out the punishments awarded, he must acknowledge that there was a case for further legislation. It was of the greatest importance, in his mind, to secure a uniformity of punishment, and to prevent two similar sentences from being carried out in two very dissimilar ways. It seemed to him to be quite impossible to frame any Act of Parliament which would meet all difficulties with respect to the details of diet and discipline. Therefore, it was necessary in respect to those matters to leave power in the hands of some authority, and he could not see in what safer hands it could be left than in those of the Home Secretary, having the aid of competent advisers, and subject to the control of that House. He should therefore support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. HIBBERT said, he did not wish to discuss the Bill from a religious point of view, because he thought the right hon. Gentleman had satisfied the House that he did not intend to give any power under the third clause of the Bill to appoint ministers. He strongly objected to the power which the Secretary of State for the Home Department proposed to take under the Bill of removing prisoners from local gaols, under certain circumstances, and placing them in county gaols. That was a most unusual and unwarrantable power, and quite beyond the necessity of the case, which would have been satisfied by taking a power to refuse expenses in prisons where the separate system was not carried out. He should oppose the clause in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the petitions against the Bill came only from Protestants, but he (Mr. Hibbert) had that day presented a petition from the visiting justices of Salford, objecting to the power taken by the Home Secretary to direct how punishments should be carried out. Whilst they admitted that there should be a certain definition of hard labour, they held that the powers of the Secretary of State were already sufficient, and that any extension of them would involve an unnecessary and injudicious interference with the duties of the visiting justices. He agreed in the observations of the right hon. Member for South Staffordshire, with one exception. He doubted whether it would be wise to insert the rules for gaols in an Act of Parliament, because that might prevent future amendment in details. The great improvement which had already been effected in county gaols was due not to the Home Secretary, but to the visiting justices throughout the country. It was most desirable that these gentlemen should continue to devote attention to so important a matter, but there was reason to fear that if the rules were laid down positively by an Act of Parliament they would not give the same consideration to the subject, as their suggestions would then be of no avail. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman, that instead of defining the rules in a schedule to an Act of Parliament the better plan would be to lay the rules when drawn up on the table of the House, as was done in the case of the Minutes of the Privy Council, that they might be considered before they were carried into operation. He could not adopt the right hon. Member for North Staffordshire's definition of hard labour. Mat-making, cotton-picking, and so on, really constituted hard labour if a prisoner was bound to do a certain amount of such work each day. If the principle of the right hon. Gentleman were established, only a small proportion of the prisoners in Salford Gaol would be regarded as subject to hard labour. In addition to the tread-wheel and cranks, the employment in that establishment included mat-making, weaving, picking oakum, wool, and cotton, smith and carpenters' work, shoemaking, tailoring, &c. During the year ending May 24th the work done by the prisoners yielded a clear profit of £2,245, and that was a relief for which the taxpayers were grateful. Comparing the average net cost of prisoners in different gaols, he found that the highest rate was at Oakham, owing, no doubt, to the small number of inmates. The lowest rate was at Salford, £11 4s. 5½d. per head. At Stafford the rate was £18 10s. 7½d.; at Wakefield, £14 6s. 5½d.; and at Manchester, £14 17s. 9d. The average cost of the inmates of the Government convict prisons was £37 per head per annum; and, comparing that with the other figures, he saw no inducement to extend the authority of the Secretary of State in this direction. As to the separation he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not press the 5th clause, but would be satisfied with the improvements which were gradually taking place. On the subject of dietary he had received communications from the governors of Lancaster Gaol and Liverpool Borough Gaol approving some of the alterations in the dietary, but pointing out that they would give considerable trouble and require the engagement of additional officers.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he believed that the Bill would be much more acceptable if the apprehension had not been entertained that some of its provisions would have the effect of very much interfering with the liberty of action which had hitherto been allowed to the magistrates. A good deal of disappointment had been occasioned also by the fact, that the Bill did not give full effect to the recommendations generally approved by the Lords' Committee of last year. The three cardinal points were the enforcement of the separate system, hard labour, and uniformity of diet, and in his opinion any amendment of the law relating to the management of the gaols would be inadequate which did not contain provisions on these points. As to the apprehended interference with the magistrates, the Home Secretary had stated that he set no value on Clause 4, as it gave no new power, and that he was prepared to abandon it. After such an announcement, he thought that they need not look at that provision with the apprehension entertained by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. Indeed there existed no necessity for their entering into a discussion upon the subject. With respect to the great question of the religious teaching of prisoners, and of children in workhouses, he had to observe that he should be ready to discuss it at the proper time and in the proper place, but he did not believe that they had such time or place before them at that moment. The question they had to consider was whether they should not allow the Bill to go into Committee in order that they might be enabled to consider the amendments which the right hon. Baronet himself announced that he was prepared to introduce into its clauses, in accordance with the suggestions which had fallen from both sides of the House. If they were all agreed as to a uniform system of gaol management, there would be no difficulty in embodying the requisite powers in an Act of Parliament. He ventured to ask whether the time had not come when Members ought to lay aside their individual crotchets. He could not say that he had himself disapproved of the separate system when it had first been introduced; and his objections to it, as it was carried out at Pentonville, had not quite disappeared; but it had been adopted in almost all the great gaols throughout the country, and he believed they might take it for granted that it ought to be generally enforced for the purpose of ensuring uniformity in our system of prison discipline. It had been said that there would be a difficulty in inserting the rules in an Act of Parliament; but in the statute which was the model for legislation on such a matter he found that the rules were inserted. He hoped great alterations would be made in the Bill. He was anxious to obtain a definition of hard labour, and the insertion in the clauses or schedules of a series of rules; but he was quite prepared to support the Motion for the second reading, so that they might be able to consider those details in Committee.

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, the 4th clause gave no additional powers to the Secretary of State, but he had no objection to withdraw it, though he did not admit there was any foundation for the apprehensions entertained by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. If he had intended to give the slightest additional power to the Home Secretary with respect to the teaching of religion in prisons, he should have proposed the change in an open way by introducing a clause for the purpose, and he could only regret that he should have been thought capable of acting otherwise. He was also sorry that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had alluded to a correspondence between the Home Office and the visiting justices of three gaols in Middlesex, because if the hon. Gentleman had waited till the documents were produced he would have seen that the course he had taken was not unworthy the office he had the honour to fill, and that, in fact, the visiting justices of one of the prisons entirely concurred in his opinions. The right hon. Member for Wilts (Mr. S. Estcourt) had expressed his regret that the Bill did not give effect to three of the recommendations of the Lords' Committee—those relating to hard labour, rules, and dietaries. It would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to frame such a definition of hard labour as would be sufficiently comprehensive to include all kinds of labour deserving to be called hard; but he would be ready to accept in Committee any definition likely to answer all the requisite conditions. The leading rules with respect to prisons were laid down in existing Acts of Parliament, but the proposal of the Lords' Committee to embody in a Bill every rule relating to every prison, while it would produce uniformity, would prove in many cases quite impracticable. As for dietaries, the recommendation of the Lords' Committee was, not that there should be any absolute rule laid down in the Bill, but that the subject should be inquired into; and he acted according both to the letter and to the spirit of that recommendation, in appointing a Commission of Inquiry, and afterwards sending to the local authorities in each district the dietary tables suggested by the Commissioners, recommending it to them, but not absolutely enforcing its adoption. On the whole, he believed the principle of the Bill met with the general approval of the House, and he should be ready in Committee to give the best consideration to any suggestion that might be made for the amendment of the clauses.

The House divided:—Ayes 116; Noes 49: Majority 67.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

THIRD READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question—[13th June], "That the Bill be now read the third time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, he rose to take objection to this measure on the third reading—a course which he was aware placed him under considerable disadvantage. But he begged to remind the House that no discussion had occurred on the principle of the Bill on the second reading, or, at least, the discussion then was very slight and inadequate to the importance of the measure. He took exception to the measure on three main grounds. First, he thought it very unnecessary to disturb the present relations between the taxpayers and the machinery by which the taxes were collected. Next, if it was at all desirable to alter the system upon which the taxation was collected, he thought it exceedingly undesirable to do so by a permissive Bill. And, thirdly, he regarded all Bills which contained large and sweeping exceptions as very objectionable. Having acted as a Commissioner of Taxes for the last forty years, he was able to speak with considerable confidence on the way in which the operation proceeded. He could speak as to the smoothness of that operation, the little annoyance it caused to the people, the very small amount of loss occasioned to the Exchequer by the mode of payment and collection, and therefore the undesirableness of interference with it. Moreover, he greatly apprehended that if the Bill passed it would be only the prelude of more compulsory measures. If that were so, a very considerable element in the collection of our national taxation would be disturbed. A body of gentlemen throughout the country now gave their time gratuitously to the supervision of that revenue operation—he meant the local Commissioners of Taxes, to the value of whose services the Chancellor of the Exchequer had more than once borne testimony. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Hear, hear!] Surely, then, it was no light matter that that right hon. Gentleman should throw discouragement and discredit upon exertions of these gentlemen for the public interest. If the measure was carried to the full extent, he seriously feared that the local Commissioners of Taxes would in a great degree cease to discharge those duties. They would find those duties very irksome to them when they had to be performed as if under compulsion and in co-operation with officers not of their appointment, but strangers brought to the locality and shifted about from time to time, and altogether very different from the men with whom they had hitherto acted. Although, no doubt, assessors and collectors of taxes were in theory or in law changeable from year to year, yet in practice the same men, the men most intelligent and best educated in their respective parishes, were chosen by their fellow parishioners as collectors and assessors of taxes, and in the rural districts the collector and the assessor was generally one and the same person. They executed their functions with perfect integrity, and he did not see why a great slur should be cast upon them simply because the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or rather the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, might have on their hands a number of supernumerary officers for whom they desired to find situations. He found by the third clause that a species of election was given, and the districts were to be invited to decide whether they would put the Bill in force. Most country places would refuse; some of the large towns, such as London, Liverpool, and Birmingham, might be disposed to consent to it. What was good for London, he should have thought would be good for all the large towns, but it appeared London was to be excepted. He had not heard any adequate reason assigned; but there might have been some pressure put on the right hon. Gentleman. Perhaps the sixteen Members representing the metropolis had an interview, or had expressed their opinion in a sufficiently emphatic manner; but though the metropolis was excepted now, do not let those Members flatter themselves that it would long remain so. Once let the Bill become law, and it would soon be made compulsory throughout the length and breadth of the land. He confessed that if there was to be a change, he would rather it were made compulsory at once. They would then know what they had to grapple with. Some discharged exciseman or officer, formerly employed in collecting the paper duty, was to be sent down by the Inland Revenue to collect the taxes; the country would be formed into little arrondissements as the Commissioners might think fit, and sous-préfets were to be appointed for the collection of taxes, whose office would become a focus of espionage. The clerks of the Commissioners, he found, were to be paid one penny for each notice sent out, which would not remunerate them for their trouble. At present notices were distributed by the local collectors, who went from house to house and collected the taxes, which he believed were cheerfully paid; but under the new system persons were to go to the market town to pay their taxes: if the amount was small it might be paid in postage stamps, but defaulters would be returned to the Exchequer, and costs incurred, probably twenty times the original sum. He could not see how that could be called an economical measure. When the question was first agitated it was referred to the local Commissioners of Taxes, whose opinion, it was understood, was very generally against it. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The majority affirmed it.] Then, why was this Bill not brought forward four years ago? It was said that £50,000 would be saved by this Bill, but the omission of the metropolis would very much reduce that amount; and when they came to consider the allowance made to the assessors and collectors, it was difficult to see any economy in the measure. The Bill would be injurious to the country; it would be ill-received by gentlemen whose services had been valuable to the State, and they were to be treated with contumely and placed in a position that made their duty irksome to them. He should, therefore, take the sense of the House, and move that the Bill be read a third time that day three months.

MR. PACKE said, he rose to second the Amendment. He should like to know some good reason for the proposed change in the system of collecting the taxes. The right hon. Gentleman had happily for himself found the means to muzzle the sixteen Members for the metropolis. ["No, no!"] If that was not so he had no doubt their votes would be given against the Bill. Strong petitions had been presented against the Bill from the Tower Hamlets, from Marylebone, and St. Martin's, Westminster. In addition, petitions had come from all parts of the country, for there never was a more unpopular Bill. There were very strong petitions from Birmingham, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Bath, Stockport, West Bromwich, and other influential towns, against the Bill. People generally were not very fond of paying taxes, but if they must pay them they did not like to have the unnecessary trouble and inconvenience put upon them which the Bill proposed. There were many small sums which the poorer classes had to pay for taxes, and they would not like to have to walk several miles to the market town to pay them. There ought to be very strong reasons to justify them in passing a Bill to inflict the burden on the poorer classes, and he had heard none at present. Another objectionable feature of the Bill was, that persons living in the country would have to pay their taxes to the exciseman—never a very popular officer—instead of to the village collector, as heretofore. He, therefore, very cordially seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Sir John Trollope.)

MR. COX said, he rose at the same time as the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Packe) and for the same purpose, to second the Amendment. Although he sat there as one of the sixteen representatives of the metropolis, if a Bill which applied to the country generally, excepting the metropolis, was in his opinion a bad Bill, he held himself free to vote against it. He had gone into the lobby against the second reading because he believed the Bill to be a bad Bill, and one which showed the tendency of the present Government to introduce a complete system of centralization. Thinking that such a measure ought not to apply to the metropolis, he also thought that it ought not to be inflicted upon any other part of the country. He would like to hear the opinion of the representatives of large constituencies, such as Liverpool and Birmingham, upon the question why their constituents should be brought under the operation of the Bill if the metropolis was exempted? He could assure the House he knew of no compact between the metropolitan Members and the Government in relation to this Bill. He had heard that one of the Members for Middlesex did communicate with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who declined to receive the deputation, and referred them to the Chief Commissioner of Inland Revenue. What further took place he could not say. However, as he had voted against the second reading of the Bill, so he should vote against the third reading, believing that it would do much harm and could do no good.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he must admit that there were parts of the Bill which deserved approval, such as allowing payments of taxes to be made by Post Office orders, and by stamps, and also the removal of the liability to pay taxes twice over, owing to defalcations on the part of the collectors. Still he had been disagreeably impressed by the exemption granted to the metropolis. The result would be that if passed the measure would really only operate in the country districts, an exceptional mode of legislation which was very objectionable. Again, the Bill proposed a complete change in the mode of payment of the assessors. Under the old law the collectors were paid by a poundage; but under the proposed measure they were to be paid at the rate of three half-pence a line on the certificate of assessment. He wished to ask for an explanation of that mode of payment. It would be extremely difficult, he believed, to carry the measure into operation in large towns; but it was in the country districts that it was proposed to work the Bill, and so far as he was informed, the assessors in those districts would receive no remuneration at all. In his part of the country there were some places where only two or three persons were assessed, and the consequence would be that the remuneration to the assessors would be so trifling that he could not suppose the local Commissioners would be content to permit the introduction of the Government Bill. He should, therefore, vote against the third reading of the Bill, unless he received a satisfactory explanation. The separation of the collection from the assessment he did not complain of, but he thought the Government should take care that the remuneration should be proportionate to the duties to be performed.

Mr. AYRTON said, he had heard with surprise the objections of the hon. Baronet (Sir John Trollope), that the character of the Bill as a permissive Bill was something quite new. The fact was that all legislation in respect of local self-government during the last twenty years, had been of a permissive character. Then as to the exemption of the metropolis from the Bill, he would remind the House that when the Municipal Reform Act was passed the metropolis was exempted, and when it became necessary to deal with the local management of the metropolis a special Act was passed. There was nothing, therefore, extraordinary in the principle of the Bill of exempting the metropolis from its provisions. It had been said that the exemption was the result of a compromise between the metropolitan Members and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he certainly was not aware of any such compromise. If the Bill were extended to the metropolis it would be necessary to introduce some special provisions, in order to place it on the same footing as the rest of the country. If the Bill were not found suitable, and if it were rejected throughout the country, there could not possibly be any danger to the metropolis; but if, on the other hand, its working were found to be beneficial, there was no reason why its advantages could not be extended to the metropolis at a future time. As the Bill at present stood, however, he believed it would be very injurious to the metropolis.

Mr. HORSFALL said, that he had supported the Bill on its second reading because he concurred in the principle, and he was still of opinion that if it was carried out in a proper manner it would confer a boon upon the ratepayers by effecting a considerable saving. He had, however, a strong feeling against the metropolis being exempted from its provisions, and he therefore thought it his duty to oppose the third reading of the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not imagine how the test of value of the Bill could be found in the exemption of the metropolis from its operation. If the Bill were a good one for the ratepayers generally, the exclusion of the metropolis could only be so far disadvantageous to the metropolis itself. If, on the other hand, the Bill called upon the ratepayers to make needless sacrifices, and placed them under new disabilities, it should be rejected altogether. The question of the exclusion of the metropolis was fully debated in Committee, and he could say that all the knowledge he had of the support of, or opposition to the Bill by the metropolitan Members, was that the hon. Member for Finsbury opposed it, and the hon. Members for Lambeth and the Tower Hamlets supported it. How, therefore, it was possible that the exclusion of the metropolis was to determine the question, whether the Bill was a good or a bad Bill, he could not comprehend. That the exclusion or inclusion of the metropolis might be a mistake was another question, but he could not understand how that could form the turning point of the rejection or acceptance of the Bill. The exclusion of the metropolis was, however, to be taken in connection with another feature of the measure. The Bill was a permissive Bill. The right hon. Gentleman who had moved the rejection of the Bill had founded his opposition to the measure in a great degree upon the fact, that it was a permissive Bill; but he must remind the House that no measure of the kind could be passed unless it were a permissive Bill, so that the choice lay between a permissive Bill or no Bill at all. The idea of passing a compulsory measure to wrest from the hands of the local Commissioners the valuable patronage they at present enjoyed was, he believed, a perfectly visionary project. Every one must acknowledge that the services rendered by the Commissioners were not only valuable but essential to the working of the direct taxation of this country, and nothing that he had ever said in that House had had the slightest tendency to weaken the system or undermine the authority of the Commissioners. He had at all times endeavoured to magnify the obligations which were due to the Commissioners, and in every way to sustain their authority, and he had not in any degree departed from that principle in the present Bill. The Commissioners themselves excluded the metropolis. They knew perfectly well from the communications that they had received, that the majority of the Boards were in favour of such a measure as the one before the House. He had stated previously that there were reasons in favour of the exclusion of the metropolis—reasons which did not extend to other places. It was not, like most towns in the country, a centre for the payment of the country district around. In London there were no officers who were capable of performing the duties which would be intrusted to them under the provisions of the Bill, and a new set would consequently have to be appointed. It might, therefore, have been said that their object in including the metropolis was to obtain the appointment of so many new officers. One objection to the present system was the extreme uncertainty and slowness of the collection of the revenue. They had but little command over the officers, and the money even after its collection found its way to the Exchequer but slowly. In London this did not apply. There the payments were made by the collectors immediately to Somerset House. The case of the metropolis and of the large towns was entirely distinct, because in most of the large towns there would not be a power of separate action which would enable them to exempt themselves from the provisions of the Bill, whereas in London there was such a power, and it was morally certain that the power would be exercised. To hon. Gentlemen, therefore, who did not object to the principle of the Bill, he must point out that the exclusion of the metropolis was much more nominal than real, and could not determine the question whether the Bill was a good or a bad one. It was said that the Bill was most unpopular in the country. Now, if he had evidence of that unpopularity he should be surprised indeed, the object of the Bill being merely to insure certainty, regularity, and responsibility, and to relieve the taxpayers from inconvenience. The desire of the Government was not to obtain advantages for the State as against the taxpayer, but to substitute a good system for a very defective one, as far as the collection of taxes was concerned. As to the alleged unpopularity of the Bill, he did not see how that could be when it had been for four months before the country, and the number of petitioners against it was only between 3,000 and 4,000. That was a pretty good answer to the statement as to unpopularity, when it was remembered that the Bill could not be expected to be acceptable to a certain class of paid officers—the collectors and assessors of taxes throughout the country. With regard to the assessors, the present law recognized no payment to the assessor except in case of the income tax, as to which the payment was left in the Bill precisely as it stood at present. In the case of the assessed taxes, the assessor received no payment whatever. But, then, it was said that the assessorship was united with the collectorship. The intention of the law, however, was that the assessor and the collector should be totally different persons, and should, in fact, act as a check upon each other. The law was now evaded by placing the two offices in the same hands; but it was proposed to separate the two offices, and so to act really up to what was now the theory of the law. Practically, no doubt, the assessor had been a paid officer, and the Government, taking the matter into consideration, had provided a mode of remuneration for him. Then it was said that a permissive Bill ought only to be adopted where the circumstances of the country were different. Well, that was exactly the fact, the circumstances of the country were different. Then, as to the payment of the assessors, in populous places the business of assessing and collecting taxes was very valuable; in thinly populated places it was a great burden. The Bill had been made permissive so as to respect the discretion of the Commissioners; but that was no reason why the Government should not consider the case of those assessors and collectors—and they were very numerous—whose duties were rather a burden than a privilege. So unremunerative was the business of collection, though often joined with assessment, that in some places the inhabitants raised a salary for the collector. In rural districts the office was accepted with great reluctance, and was often imposed in defiance of the strongest remonstrances. He frequently had letters from persons complaining that they had been required by the Commissioners to act as collectors, and it was said that in some instances the office was conferred on persons from pique and spleen. One of the principal objects of the Bill was the giving of relief in cases where the office was felt to be burdensome. Saving was not the only consideration; and this saving must be materially diminished by the compensation which must be paid to the collectors; but he freely admitted that no saving to be effected would justify the passing of a burdensome Bill affecting the collection of taxes. There were other reasons why the Bill should pass; and among these were the present liability of parishes to re-assessment, through the neglect of the Commissioners or through default. He supposed there was not a week that he was not obliged to answer some person or another who complained of a collector, and he could not interfere, because the collectors were not Government officers; but this Bill would enable towns to relieve themselves of that state of things. As to the objection that the metropolis was exempted, he would remind the House that the exemption was the act of the Committee. If the Committee had determined to include the metropolis, the Government would have endeavoured to introduce provisions for carrying out that object; but, on the other hand, if the Bill was desired by the people of Liverpool, Birmingham, and other large towns, the exemption of the metropolis afforded no reason why they should not have it. Whenever the Commissioners liked to exempt themselves they could do so; but a majority of the Commissioners had expressed themselves to be favourable to the Bill, so that he thought the right hon. Baronet must not have attended to that point. A large number of the Commissioners had not replied at all to the application made to them on the subject, and therefore he thought that they might be considered favourable to the measure. He thought it would be found that the remuneration which might be allowed under the Bill would be sufficient, for when it was said that the clerks would have to pay a penny for the postage-stamp on the notice, for which they were to be allowed only a penny, he would observe, in reply, that a clerk would have his percentage besides, and that where he had to send out notices to 100 persons in the same street, it was not likely he would put stamps on the notices when he could have them delivered by a messenger for, perhaps, about a shilling. It was, however, in the hands of the House to do what it pleased with the Bill, but he would remind hon. Members that the people of Ireland and Scotland were contented with a system similar to the one now proposed, but inferior to it, inasmuch as in Ireland and Scotland the people could not pay their taxes in stamps or by money orders. He hoped, however, that they would be able to extend the latter advantage to the sister kingdoms.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that before the House went to a division there was one point on which it ought to be well informed. His right hon. Friend (Sir John Trollope) had referred to the communications which had been made to the various Commissioners of the land tax in different parts of the country in the year 1860, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that on the whole the majority of those who had answered the questions put to them were favourable to this measure, or to a measure more extensive, and he had rather twitted his right hon. Friend for not having paid sufficient attention to the circumstance. Now it was impossible for any private information to compete with that possessed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but the right hon. Baronet had good authority for the statement he had made. In the Committee which sat two years ago, over which the hon. Member for Liverpool presided, the question of the collection of taxes by Government officers was raised, and Mr. Pressly, the chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, in reply to a question put to him with regard to the propriety of some such alteration as that now proposed, said—

"It would be very desirable that the Government should appoint their own assessors and collectors; at the same time we thought it necessary, some three or four years ago, to address letters to all the Boards of Commissioners in the country, and after reading the answers of the clerks we found it impossible to carry it out."

The principal Secretary to the Board of Inland Revenue, Mr. Dobson, was also examined by the same Committee as to the circular, and he stated—

"The replies received were in opposition to our views; there were some consenting parties, but generally speaking they were in opposition to our views."

When asked—

"Can you state generally the nature of the arguments against the proposed change?"

"No; but as far as my recollection serves they would not condescend to argue the point at all."

That was the sort of evidence given before the Committee two years ago, and if it showed that the measure was unpopular, it was hardly fair to twit his right hon. Friend with not having attended to the subject. There was one point on which hon. Members ought to make up their minds, and that was the cardinal point—the permissive character of the Bill. He must say for himself that he approved of the main object of the Bill, and he should be glad if they could arrive at a system by which the collection of the revenue might be placed in the hands of collectors appointed by the Government; but it was a very delicate question, and one which came home to every taxpayer in the kingdom. Now, what was the House called upon to do? It was asked to give a permissive power to Boards in different parts of the country to impose upon the taxpayers a system which we did not venture to impose on them ourselves by direct legislation. That was a principle against which he decidedly protested. It had been said by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, that permissive legislation had formed the basis of all local legislation for the last twenty years, and the Local Management Act had been instanced; but there was all the difference in the world between permissive legislation which placed the choice in the hands of the taxpayers, and that where the permission was given to a body of men who were neither taxpayers nor elected by taxpayers. As a magistrate he had himself experienced great difficulty in dealing with cases of permissive legislation like the Highways and Police Acts. The magistrates were appointed by the Crown, not by the ratepayers, and it was not pleasant for them to have to impose taxation. That House, which was elected by the taxpayers of the country, shrank from imposing burdens on those whom they really represented, and transferred the responsibility to the nominees of the Crown. Nothing could be more odious than the manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer put the question. He asked the House to give these local authorities power to refuse this legislation, which he believed to be desirable, because he thought they ought to be tender in the matter of patronage. Anything more odious than that mode of stating the case he could not conceive. In what position would the Commissioners stand towards the taxpayers of the country? They were asked to say whether certain measures should be enforced which that House was afraid to enforce, because they would be unpopular, and the Commissioners were told that they had that permission, because they had a great deal of valuable patronage in their hands. That was placing those gentlemen in a position of great difficulty. The truth was they ought to deal with the matter as one of principle. If the House thought it right for the interests of the country that the collection of these taxes should be placed in the hands of Government officials, they ought to come boldly forward and take the responsibility on themselves. Then they would find out what was the real opinion of their constituents, for it was hardly to be expected that many petitions would come in against the Bill so long as people thought that their local Commissioners would stand between them and its adoption. No doubt there might be strong grounds for saying that it was desirable that collectors should be appointed by the Government. There had, it was quite true, been large defalcations, and the taxpayers had suffered in consequence. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had altogether omitted to mention that the largest defalcations had happened in the metropolis, which was excluded from the Bill. In one ward there had been a defalcation of £1,700 or £1,800, and in another of £6,000. He could not understand why the metropolis was excluded. If there was any truth in the impression that the metropolis was omitted because the opposition of the metropolis was found so formidable, then that ought to make the House pause before passing the Bill. If, on the other hand, it was known beforehand that the London Commissioners would reject the Bill, what need for leaving them out? He did not exactly understand what was to be the machinery of the Bill. How were they going to deal with the stamp distributors? Already they had to give large security, and if additional security was to be demanded from them, it would be necessary to make some provision for additional compensation. The case was full of difficulties, and he believed it would be most unwise to pass the Bill in such a form.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained that with regard to Mr. Pressly he believed that gentleman's opinion was that a compulsory measure would be most economical, but that no such Bill would be likely to pass. As to Mr. Dobson, he still believed, speaking from memony, that the right hon. Gentleman opposite had not accurately stated his opinion.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE: The blue-book shows that the right hon. Gentleman is inaccurate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I adhere to my statement.

MR. LOCKE said, he could explain why the metropolis had been excluded. The Bill was a permissive Bill, and the position of the metropolis was different to that of Liverpool or any other large town. In Liverpool all the inhabitants would have an opportunity of saying whether they would adopt the Bill or not. But Southwark, for instance, consisted of large parishes, such as Bermondsey, and those parishes would not have had an opportunity of considering whether they would adopt the Bill or not, because they were connected with the Commissioners throughout the whole county. Those Commissioners would be in favour of adopting the Bill, and so the large parishes of Southwark would be swamped.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, the Amendment of which he had given notice was not intended to exclude the rural districts at all. There were two classes of tax collectors—those who received large amounts and, therefore, large remuneration, and those who received small amounts and whose remuneration was in proportion, and it was to those two classes that his Amendment applied. He was bound, of course, to look to the interests of his own constituents, and the inhabitants of the metropolis had in large numbers petitioned against the Bill. The Amendment of which he had given notice would not only have referred to the metropolis, but also to other large towns; but when he found that the Members for some of those large towns, the hon. Member for Liverpool for instance, were not against the Bill, he felt bound to give up his Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished, in justice to the hon. Member (Mr. Harvey Lewis), to make one observation. On a former occasion he (Mr. Newdegate) had stated that the withdrawal of the hon. Member's Amendment was so sudden that the large towns had been taken by surprise; but the hon. Member had since written to him and conclusively shown that a circular was issued which gave the large towns due notice of the intention to withdraw the Amendment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had justified the Bill before the House by saying that in many of the rural districts the collectorates were so poor that the Commissioners sought by the Bill to remedy this evil—under which the collectors would be appointed by the Inland Revenue Office. But why were the rural collectorates so poor? Because no measure had been introduced to consolidate these collectorates; for by giving to one collector several parishes instead of one, the whole difficulty upon which the Bill was founded would be removed. The Inland Revenue Office had long aimed at appropriating to itself these appointments. The Inland Revenue officers thought that they were in danger of want of employment; he had heard upon good authority that it was to their influence that no measure for consolidating collectorates in the country had been brought in, thus removing the admitted difficulty to remedy which the Bill had been introduced. It was perfectly well understood why Middlesex objected to being included in the Bill; and the reason was this, that in several parishes in that county the operation proposed by this Bill had been tested, and the effect was found to be, that where previously the expense of the collection of taxes was about £200, when the collection was made by the Revenue officers the expense amounted to more than £1,000. The Bill was another development of the principle of centralization, an attempt to deprive local bodies of their patronage and functions. It was perfectly plain that if this Bill were to pass the next appointment which would be grasped at by the Inland Revenue Board was that of assessors; and he did not know how the country would be satisfied when it was found that the metropolis would be excluded from such centralized interference, whilst the private affairs of every firm in the provincial towns and rural districts would be subject to the inspection of Government officers.
